CICADA

THE POETRY OF DIOSCORUS OF APHRODITO

IN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Critical Edition

Volume I, Part 1: Poem 17

CLEMENT A. KUEHN
Text and photographs of Antinoöpolis © 2011 Clement A. Kuehn. All rights reserved.

Photographs of the papyrus © Adam Bülow-Jacobsen. All rights reserved.

The unaltered, faithful reproductions of Byzantine artwork are in the public domain.

Front cover: In Greek literature and the poetry of Dioscorus, the cicada was a symbol of the poet, prophet, and philosopher. Here, cicadae by Eugene Alain Seguy (1889-1985).
This book is dedicated to my children: Aaron, Sophia, and Johanna.
O beware, my lord, of jealousy!
It is the green-ey’d monster which doth mock
The meat it feeds on.

(Iago in Shakespeare, Othello 3.3.165-67)
CONTENTS

1 Introduction
   Hymn to St. Theodosius  9
   Paraphrase  13

2 Allegorical Art in the Early Byzantine Era: Icons
   General Introduction  15
   Figure 1: Christ Pantocrator  16
   Figure 2: The Theotokos, Flanked by St. Theodore & St. George  18
   Figure 3: St. Peter  20
   Figure 4: Christ and the Theotokos  22
   Figure 5: The Theotokos, Apostles, and Ascension  26

3 Poem 17. Hymn to St. Theodosius
   Description  29
   Editions  29
   Introduction  30
   Restored Greek Transcription  31

4 Verse Translation
   Recto  33
   Verso  34

5 Commentary, Verses 1–4 (Preamble)
   Verses 1–2  35
   Verses 2–4  40
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>Allegorical Art in the Early Byzantine Era: Churches</td>
<td>47, 50, 54, 56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Figure 6: Emperor Justinian &amp; Retinue</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Figures 7–11: San Apollinare Nuovo</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Figures 12–13: Annunciation</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Figure 14: Christ Embracing St. Menas</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>Commentary, Verses 5–10 (Christ)</td>
<td>59, 65, 72, 77, 80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>Antinoöpolis, Figures 15–20</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Commentary, Verses 11–19 (Theodosius)</td>
<td>91, 97, 104, 112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>Antinoöpolis, Figures 21–26</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>Commentary, Verses 20–32 (Christ)</td>
<td>127, 141, 150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>Plates 1–2: P.Cair.Masp. II 67183 recto &amp; verso</td>
<td>177</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INTRODUCTION TO POEM 17

Hymn to St. Theodosius

Poem 17 is carefully wrought, original, and exceptionally musical. The poet has employed a rich variety of assonance, consonance, and other poetic devices to create a perfect blend of style and meaning in every verse. It is, without question, a poetic masterpiece. Poem 17 is also deep, with layers of meaning. It is impossible that an audience would have grasped all the allusions and innuendoes in this poem at a first reading. Yet there is no evidence that this hymn was ever published in Antiquity. None of Dioscorus’s poems were collected in an ancient anthology, and none of his verses were ever quoted. It is possible that Dioscorus recited the hymn at a church after Theodosius, Patriarch of Alexandria, died on June 6, 567, or on a subsequent feastday. Its later history is unknown: except that near the end of Dioscorus’s life or after his death, the poem was carefully stored in a large jar with his other poetic manuscripts and documents, then left undisturbed for over thirteen hundred years.

Poem 17 is an allegory. On the surface level of meaning, Dioscorus appears to be praising an icon of a new emperor. This was a standard rhetorical format, which the poet would have learned at school. The poet did not employ, however, the Hellenistic Greek that was the cultural language of the Byzantine Empire in the 6th century. He employed an ancient dialect, called Homeric Greek because of its use in the epics by Homer. The use of this epic language and grammar was part of a poetic revolution that had been fostered by several successful poets from his area in Upper Egypt. This experiment included usurping the pagan vocabulary and style.
of Homer for Christian topics, and it inspired such works as a verse rendition of the Gospel of John (Nonnus), a reworking of the Psalms (Apollinaris), and epic Christian centos (Eudocia).

Allegory in literary criticism and biblical exegesis was popular in Late Antiquity. Neoplatonic philosophers such as Proclus, who had studied in Alexandria, argued that Homer wrote the Iliad and the Odyssey as concealed allegories about the metaphysical world. The Fathers of the Church, especially those from Alexandria, argued that Moses prophetically wrote the first five books of the Bible as a concealed allegory about Christ and the Church.

Creative allegory in Christian poetry from this period has been difficult to substantiate. Unlike the obvious allegory in Prudentius’s Psychomachia, written in Latin, the allegories in Greek poetry (if they truly existed) were largely concealed. The poets did not explicitly say that they were writing allegory. Anomalies on the surface level of meaning could be helpful pointers to an allegorical level of meaning. Yet the deeper level had to be deciphered by the audience from images and verbal hints inside the poem, and from the religious and cultural milieu. This secrecy was related to Neoplatonic and Christian mystical literature, which expressed a fear that advanced spiritual knowledge could be misunderstood and be harmful to neophytes. The secrecy can in fact be traced back to the parables by Christ, whose spiritual message was purposefully recondite: ὁ δὲ εἶπεν· ὑμῖν δέδοται γνῶναι τὰ μυστήρια τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς ἐν παραβολαῖς ἵνα βλέποντες μὴ βλέπωσιν καὶ ἀκούοντες μὴ συνιῶσιν. “And he said: ‘Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the rest in parables, that seeing they might not see and hearing they might not understand’.” (Lc. 8:10; cf. Mt. 13:34) Concealed allegories from the early Byzantine

Clement A. Kuehn
Era might include the epic Dionysiaca by Nonnus and the epyllion Hero and Leander by Musaeus, both written in an Homeric style.

Dioscorus did not make a consistent effort to hide his allegorical meaning. Sometimes the deeper level supplants the superficial, so that the surface level becomes, at times, incomprehensible if not viewed through the lens of Byzantine spirituality. The allegorical meaning is always coherent and profound. Dioscorus was well-educated, cosmopolitan, and talented. He was Christian and surrounded by churches and important monasteries. Upper Egypt (the higher southern part of Egypt) was a center of religious and poetic innovations during Late Antiquity and the early Byzantine Era. The allegorical sense of Poem 17 is condensed, philosophical, and deeply religious. It must be extracted from subtle signs—but the clues are always there. The closest modern equivalent is the poetry by T. S. Eliot. If one were to compare Eliot’s poems to Shakespeare, they would appear nonsensical. Eliot was part of a literary revolution of the early 20th century, and he used Shakespeare for his own ends. If one compares Dioscorus to Homer, the Byzantine poet’s music would be, at best, a cicada song. As one needs to understand the history of Western culture to make sense of a verse from Eliot, one needs to explore the Byzantine culture to understand Dioscorus. But the effort is always worthwhile.

The closest Byzantine equivalent to the allegorical style used by Dioscorus, or at least the most accessible, can be found the pictorial art of the period. Justinian the Great (regnal years 527–565) was a generous patron of the arts, and allegorical mosaics and icons created during his reign and shortly thereafter have survived at Ravenna in Italy (the most powerful city of the Western half of the Empire) and in the fortified monastery at Mount Sinai, which was established by Justinian himself. These mosaics and icons, as well as Coptic tapestries and frescoes depict Christ, the Virgin, angels, and the faithful in heaven as an emperor, empress, consuls, generals, and other nobility in a Byzantine imperial court. Some examples will be examined in this critical edition to show trends in sixth-century allegorical art and how they illuminate Dioscorus’s poetry.

Clement A. Kuehn

Poem 17 was discovered on papyrus in Egypt in 1905, along with other creative literary works, legal documents, and personal papers belonging to Dioscorus and his family. These are the oldest poems written by the hand of a known poet, and the manuscripts contain his changes and corrections. Since Jean Maspero’s editio princeps of this poem in 1913, it has appeared in several modern editions, notably by Ernst Heitsch (1964), Leslie MacCoull (1984, 1989), Berry Baldwin (1985), and Jean-Luc Fournet (1999). The Hymn to St. Theodosius was the first poem in Heitsch’s edition, which served as the standard edition for thirty-five years. It was the first poem because of its imperial significance. A more comprehensive numbering system was introduced by Fournet, which system is adopted here. These earlier editions focused on the surface level of meaning and how it contained information about the administration of Egypt and Hellenistic rhetoric. The present critical edition focuses on the allegorical, and Poem 17 is discussed first because it serves as a solid introduction to the style of Dioscorus.

The allegory exists primarily in symbolic imagery. The poet does not use a biblical vocabulary, so significant parallels to biblical words or phrases are infrequent. Besides, the poet was probably less familiar with the Greek version of the Bible than the Coptic, his native language. The symbolic imagery forms a coherent whole. Here below is a summary of the allegorical level. It follows the Greek text of the poem. The poet uses enjambment and sometimes the sense is spread across several verses, therefore the numbering is approximate. The hymn has four distinct parts: three on the recto side (the front) and one on the verso side (the back).
Paraphrase of the Hymn to St. Theodosius

Part I: Preamble

Verse 1: The poet announces the presence of the Divine, who brings life.
Verse 2: The poet calls the congregation to a devout attitude,
Verse 3: he recalls the remission of sins by Christ,
Verse 4: and praises the purity and perseverance of the congregation.

Part II: Christ

Verse 5: a restoration
Verse 6: Because Christ is gracious and is the Word,
Verse 7: sing a hymn to the Son of God in heaven.
Verse 8: God the King loves Christ,
Verse 9: yet gave his beloved Son to redeem the world.
Verse 10: In righteousness, the Son tends to the needs of the faithful.

Part III: Theodosius

Verse 11: With divine inspiration,
Verse 12: Christ nourished the spirit of Theodosius.
Verse 13: Throughout his life on earth, Theodosius honored God.
Verse 14: Having shared in Christ’s suffering, he is now a saint.

Clement A. Kuehn
Verse 15: You, Patriarch, are preeminent among the saints.
Verse 16: You were unique: receive your heavenly reward.
Verse 17: You saints, continue to contemplate the Creator,
Verse 18: who is the root of the fruit of Wisdom,
Verse 19: The Son of God, who is praised by the patriarchs.

Part IV: Christ

Verse 20: Rejoice, you saints, who share in his glory forever!
Verse 21: Let envy wander far away from your domain,
Verse 22: let the envious snake wander far from your domain.
Verse 23: The faithful will be freed from Hades:
Verse 24: I weep for our fall.
Verse 25: You raise up the faithful, who receive divinity.
Verse 26: Your glory, Lord, will never die.
Verse 27: You are the beginning and the end.
Verse 28: Your Spirit illuminates.

...
Verse 31: Lord, you are the only begotten Son:
Verse 32: God has entrusted the faithful to you.

...
Few icons have survived from the early Byzantine Era, and most of these can now be found in the monastery at Mount Sinai. This fortified monastery was founded by Emperor Justinian and completed sometime between the death of Empress Theodora (548) and the death of Justinian (565)—that is, during the lifetime of Dioscorus and before the death of St. Theodosius. It was originally called the Monastery of the Theotokos (“Mother of God”) and the church still bears this name, but the monastery in now called St. Catherine’s. The Sinai peninsula in the 6th century was not part of the province of Egypt, but was in the province of Palaestina Tertia, also called Palaestina Salutaris, whose capital was the ancient city of Petra (in modern Jordan). Mount Sinai was a popular destination for Jewish and Christian pilgrims. There was easy access to Sinai from Antinoöpolis, Egypt, by way of the Via Nova Hadriana, which ran across the desert to the Red Sea and then south to the port of Berenike. When Muslim Arabs subjugated the Sinai peninsula and Egypt in the 7th century, the fortified monastery remained independent but was tied off from Constantinople and the rest of the Byzantine World. Therefore, the three icons below (Figures 1, 2, and 3), which appear to have been created by Constantinople artists, were probably donated to the monastery by Justinian at its foundation or certainly before the middle of the 7th century. All three sixth-century icons at the Sinai monastery demonstrate an allegorical style. Christ, the Mother of God, saints, and angels are presented as a Byzantine emperor, empress, consuls, generals, and courtiers.
Figure 1 (facing page). Christ Pantocrator. Artist: Unknown. Date: first half of the 6th century. Provenance: Constantinople. Present location: Sinai. 84 x 45.5 cm. Encaustic icon.

This is the earliest of the three Sinai icons, and the least allegorical. As in all three icons, there is not an attempt at an historical reproduction of the life of Christ. It is an image of Christ in heaven, the All-Powerful, and was created for devotional purposes. The golden nimbus (“halo”) suggests his spiritual nature, as does the general aloofness of his facial expression. His eyes are not fixed on any particular point. He has raised two fingers, which are the standard sign of spiritual blessing. Yet the heavenly king is presented here as a very real emperor on earth. He is wearing a tunic and mantle that appear simple in design, but their color is imperial purple. He is carrying a jewel- and pearl-studded codex of the Bible, such as would be found in the imperial palace. Palace architecture is behind him. The realism of the figure is emphasized by the asymmetry of his wide-open eyes, the arched eye-brow, the flesh beneath his eyes, and the treatment of his moustache and beard. The color of his skin is especially vibrant. This icon, an accomplished masterpiece whose artist is unknown, was probably an imperial gift to the monastery.
Figure 2 (facing page). The Theotokos, Flanked by St. Theodore and St. George.
Artist: Unknown. Date: 6th century. Provenance: Constantinople. Present location: Sinai. 68.5 x 49.7 cm. Encaustic icon.

This is a representation of the Theotokos (“Mother of God”) in heaven. It was created for devotional purposes. She is flanked by Saint Theodore (bearded) and Saint George, and two archangels stand behind. The spirituality is suggested by the angels’ translucent nimbi, raised eyes, and pure white garments. The hand of God descends and emanates white light upon the Virgin Mary and the Christ Child. The angels are bending away in religious awe and looking not at the hand, but at the invisible God. The spirituality is also emphasized by her aloofness, which is conveyed by averted eyes. The spiritual hierarchy is clear: the Theotokos is at the center of the composition and raised off the ground on her throne. Although seated, she is equal in height to the two saints. But the hand of God is above her, and the Christ Child is in front of her.

In an allegorical style more comprehensive than Figure 1, the Mother of God is depicted as a Byzantine empress. She is wearing a maphorion of imperial purple and thick makeup. Her scarlet shoes were a prerogative of the empress. She is seated upon a pearl-studded throne. Her child is clothed in gold. The two saints, soldiers during their lifetime, are here depicted as Byzantine generals, wearing the sumptuous clothing and slippers of civil authorities. At the time of Justinian, the strategos (“general”) was an administrative office as well as a military rank. The two archangels are holding golden scepters. The realism of this imperial allegory is conveyed by several details. The Christ Child is presented as a real infant, with the mother holding him securely on her lap with her right hand. She is carrying his full weight on her left thigh, which she tries to relieve with her left hand. With her right foot and right knee turned sideways, she balances the child’s right foot. In contrast to the active eyes, hands, and legs of the mother, the generals are stiff as pylons: their eyes straight ahead, their shoulders squared. The older soldier is bearded and sunburnt, the younger is pale.
Figure 3 (facing page). Saint Peter. Artist: Unknown. Date: second half of the 6th century. Provenance: Constantinople. Present location: Sinai. 92.8 x 53.1 cm. Encaustic icon.

This is the last of the three Sinai icons from the 6th century and is the most realized allegory. (It might even date to the early 7th century.) It is an imitation of one half of a consular diptych (“two-wings”). The two consuls were the highest civil and military magistrates in the Roman republic. In the empire, they were second in power only to the emperor, until the consulship was finally abolished in the 6th century. The consul here is wearing the toga praetexta, worn only by high ranking officials. His hair and beard are well-trimmed and groomed, and his face betrays a well-educated, care-worn appearance. In the background is palace architecture. This architecture, hinted at in Figures 1 and 2, is now elaborate.

The artist has made a few changes to the standard secular design in order to show that this is not a living consul but a saint in heaven. There is the large golden nimbus. In the three medallions above, one would normally find representations of the emperor, empress, and co-consul. Instead, the three medallions here might be recalling the episode of the crucifixion when John was given guardianship over the Virgin by Jesus (note the cross behind). Saint Peter, instead of holding the typical symbols of secular authority—a mappa and scepter—is holding the keys to heaven and a cross staff. The cross might be suggesting Peter’s own death by crucifixion. Despite its secular design, this icon was created for devotional purposes.

Clement A. Kuehn
Figure 4 (following pages). Christ and the Theotokos. Artist: Unknown. Date: 6th century. Provenance: Ravenna, Italy. Present location: Berlin. 29 x 13 cm.; 29 x 12.7 cm. Ivory diptych.

This diptych was created roughly at the same time as Figure 2 and probably by Constantinople artists working in Italy. It is a concealed spiritual allegory modeled on the consular diptych. The aged and bearded consul is sitting uneasily upon the consular sella curulis. His forehead is lined with care. He is wearing a Roman toga and holding a large, jewel-studded codex, a prized possession symbolizing his stature as a judge. The highly adorned palace architecture in the background contains pagan Hellenistic motifs. Two nobles stand behind, also wearing Roman togas. Their faces are haggard and wearing the same serious expressions that are seen in the Ravenna mosaic of emperor Justinian and his court (Figure 6). (This diptych shows similarities to the artwork in the throne created for Maximian, the Archbishop of Ravenna.) The consular design of the left wing is mirrored on the right. In fact, the consul on the left has turned his knee toward the other consul, who has turned her knee toward him, thus visually strengthening their close relationship. In the background of the right wing is again ornate palace architecture boasting pagan Hellenistic motifs. The woman is sitting on the consular sella curulis and holding her child firmly between her legs. Her face is unlined and her figure is soft and ample. Her attendants are young and obviously uneasy; both are wearing the chlamys of soldiers. While both attendants have their eyes fixed on the consul, she is staring straight ahead in a rigid expression, challenging the viewer. The child is scowling. The entire scene exudes royal wealth and power.

It is with difficulty that one detects another, hidden level of meaning. The noble on the consul’s right side is staring ahead and holding up a hand, perhaps in greeting or to stop the viewer from approaching closer. If it is a warning, it is echoed by the lion heads on the consul’s sella. The consul, however, is holding up two fingers in blessing. These two fingers are the only clear indication that this wing is not part of a secular, consular diptych.

In fact, the surface level, intensified by arresting details, veils a highly spiritual allegory. The seated figure in the left wing is Christ as the Ancient of Days, a prophecy found at Daniel 7:22. In this vision, the Ancient One passes judgement and the Holy Ones gain possession of the kingdom. This identification accounts for the Mosaic Laws (the Christian term for the first five books of the Bible) on the Ancient’s knee. Behind him stand Peter and Paul. In the right wing of the diptych sits the Theotokos. Behind her stand the archangels Gabriel and Michael. The Christ Child is imitating the blessing of the Ancient One. In the Child’s left hand is a papyrus roll of the New Testament, which supplanted the Mosaic Laws.

The common indications of allegory—haloes, wings, aloofness, crosses, etc.—have been eradicated by the artist. But the hierarchical symmetry and religious symbolism clearly demonstrate that this was a devotional icon.
This allegorical icon from Egypt reflects the Coptic art of the period in its rustic renderings and bold colors. The imperial, secular level of meaning provides only a thin veil for the spiritual level of meaning. Similar to the Sinai icon (Figure 2), the archangels Michael and Gabriel stand behind the Theotokos: their names are inscribed in Greek above the columns of the palace architecture. The Mother of God is seated on a jeweled throne. Flowers bloom and vines swirl behind her, on the floor, and in the margins. In the zone above, Christ is enthroned. Both are wearing imperial purple.

The spiritual level is seen vividly in the Ascension: Christ is being carried aloft by two angels into a red heaven beyond the star-filled blue. As in the other icons, he is blessing the devout viewer. (In the popular belief of the Byzantine Era, these icons carried the same beneficent grace as the spiritual beings themselves.) The spirituality is also emphasized by the elevation of the Virgin’s throne and footstool: the feet of the archangel Michael are visible beneath. The eyes of the attendant archangels are focused on the Theotokos. But emphasizing the spiritual detachment, her eyes are unfocused and the eyes of the Christ Child are averted. The twelve medallions hold busts of the apostles, whose names are written in Greek.
POEM 17. HYMN TO ST. THEODOSIUS

Physical description: 3 fragments, not joined: A = height 4.5 x length 16.5 cm; B = height 12 x length 28 cm; C = height 3 x length 2 cm.

Recto margins: top margin (A) at least 0.5 cm; right margin (B) at least 6.5 cm

Verso margins: top margin (B) at least 0.5 cm; right margin (B) at least 6.5 cm; bottom margin (A) at least 2.5 cm.

Hand: Dioscorus, uncial, clearly written.

Plates: 1-2.

Date: A.D. post June 6, 567 - ante circa 585.

Provenance: Aphrodito

Style: encomium.

Vocabulary: epic.

Meter: dactylic hexameter.

Subject: St. Theodosius I (ob. 567), Patriarch of Alexandria (535-536).

Leslie MacCoull, “The Panegyric on Justin II by Dioscorus of Aphrodito,” Byzantion 54 (1984): 575-85, pl. I-II.

Barry Baldwin, An Anthology of Byzantine Poetry (Amsterdam 1985), 100-105 [only verses 1-19].

Clement A. Kuehn
Poem 17 (Heitsch 1) uses the encomiastic formula for a poem or prose in praise of an emperor visiting a city. More specifically, on the surface level, Dioscorus employs traditional elements for praising the arrival of an official image of the emperor. Dioscorus, however, used this encomiastic template to write a poem in praise of a saint: Theodosius of Alexandria. (Cf. the secular diptych form used by artists to represent saints.) Theodosius was elected Patriarch of Alexandria in 535. Though supported by both Copts and Melchites, he was removed the following year through local intrigue. After an investigation initiated by Empress Theodora, Theodosius was rightfully returned to the Patriarchy. But only briefly: he was soon removed by Emperor Justinian for refusing to recognize the Chalcedonian Creed. After a brief incarceration, Theodosius was allowed to choose his place of exile, and he spent much of the next three decades in Upper Egypt. Following his death in 567 he was canonized a saint and posthumously declared the thirty-third pope of the Coptic Church. The most complete biography is found in the tenth-century History of the Patriarchs of the Coptic Church in Alexandria. Written in Arabic in Hermopolis, it might have drawn upon Coptic sources for the life of Theodosius. Poem 17, on the allegorical level, says that because of his inspired writing, his lifelong devotion to Christ, and the persecution that he endured, Theodosius is now preeminent among the saints.

Clement A. Kuehn
Restored Greek Transcription

recto ↑
1  [℞  ........]ς ἀμιν ἵκανε φερέσβιος ἐσθλοσυνάω[ν].
[........]ς ἀμιν ἵκανεν. ἐλευθερίης καὶ ἁρωγῆ[κ]
[δεινῶν cf]άλματων λαθικηδέος ἤγαγε τέρψιν
5  [λω]ίον ἔστιν ἕν παναοίδιον οὖνομα μέλψαι], [άτων] λαθικηδέοϲ ἠγαγε τέρψιν ἀνδράϲι τε κρατ[εροῖς]
[πολυτε]ρόϲιν ηδὲ γυναῖξ[ν].
10  [Η]λυθεν οὐ κατὰ κόϲον ἀληθέα πάντα νοϲεύει(ν).
[κλεινότ]ατον δ’ ἀτίταλλε τε θεοτοκίου πάνορον ἀϲβημα,
[ἐκ]γέν[νι]και τεῖϲν φθόνοϲ αἰς ρήϲοις, τοῖϲ] [προτεροῖϲ] βαϲιλεύϲιν ἀοίδιον εϲθρόνον υἷα.

verso →
[κοιρα]νήϲ ἀπάνευθε τε[ῆς] φθόνοϲ αἱϲν ἀλάϲβω, κοιρανής φθόνος ἐρπελος αἴεν ἀλάσθω.

[.....]... ὑμετέρησιν ὑπέεσσεται δέκμια χερσίν.

[ἵλθου] πεφρικότα τραγικώτερα δάκρυα λείβειν.

[μη τ]ρομέεις, σκηπτούχε, τὸ ἐὼν κλέος οὐποτ’ ὀλεῖται:

[εὐ] στέφος ψυκάρηνὸν πάμφυλον ἔκκιβώτιν,

[ἀκτ]ίνες ἀστράπτουσι τεῆς περικαλλέος ὀμφῆς.

[..] στέφος ψυκάρη[νου .]ν.. λαυράτα ... κατ..αφ..

30 [.....]..ε ἰμείρων φιλοπάρθενος ε[...

[οὐραν]όθεν Θεός ὕμμι πόρεν διαδήματα φωτός.

[.....].....λεν.....αφιται..ατα.ε[...

[.............].....[.....]. αυ[αξ χθον]ος ἰδ[ε .].λλ.[

35 [.............]τα ταύτα [.............]ρο...

---

1 εσθλοστηνα[ω]ν 2 ἱκανεν 7 νεον : ο post corr. νία παλλατίων 10 νυμενεί
11 δ’ Pap θεορρητοι[civ] in mg. dextra 13 γε : post corr., καὶ ante corr., lege τε
14 χριστοφορὼν : post corr. 18 κυδαλίμης εγκύμονα 19 νία 21 versus inter lineas
25 ἐρπελος εἰν in mg. dextra, alt. ε post corr. 23 ὑμετρησιν Pap, iota adscriptum 25-30 litterae in mg. dextra erasae aut abolitae 25 διοδέγμονα ante corr.
26 versus inter lineas 29 ψυκάρη[νον

Clement A. Kuehn
VERSE TRANSLATION

Recto

[......] has come to us, bringing life and all good things, [......] has come to us! He has brought to mighty men and very pleasing women the joy of help and freedom, which banishes the woe of our terrible failings.
[It is desirable to celebrate his name, sung by all.]
Because he is grace and happiness
and the beloved flower of eloquence,
sing a hymn to the young Son of the palace of many scepters,
and to the very glorious King, who loves Christ:
such a lovely gift that God gave to the world!
Not according to the world’s ways he came to shepherd all true things.
With divinely inspired counsels he nurtured the wise and illustrious spirit of Theodosius, of clear-thinking piety, who pursued since birth a fear of God and his laws,
who knows how to bear the purple robe of the Christ-bearing saints.
Hurry now, commander, and call your inhabitants;
You were unique: receive the illustrious gifts.
Contemplate always the wise foundation of the root of royalty, the basis which is pregnant with the laws of glorious Wisdom, and which is the Son on the throne, whom the earlier kings are praising in song.

Clement A. Kuehn
Rejoice with me, kings, famous for eternity!

Let envy wander far away forever from your sovereignty,

[.....] let envy, creeping forever, wander from your sovereignty.

[.....] the chains will lie beneath your hands.

[I have come] to pour out trembling, tragic tears:

you raise up the Faith that receives divinity

and glorifies humanity.

Do not be afraid, you who hold the scepter, your glory will never fade:

you are the lofty crown of all the tribes, you are the poor man’s coffer,

[the r]ays of your lovely voice illuminate like lightning.

[..] the lofty cro[wn .....] port[rait

[.........] lover of virginity, desiring [

[No] lord was ever like you:

From heaven God has given you diadems of light.

traces

Clement A. Kuehn
COMMENTARY TO POEM 17 RECTO

Please note: Several editions of the Dioscorian poems are available, with different numbering systems. I am using the numbering of P.Aphrod.Lit. IV [= Poem 1, Poem 2, etc.]. When appropriate, I give the Heitsch and/or MacCoull numbers. For details about the other literary editions and biblical editions used in the citations, see Thesaurus Linguae Graecae: http://stephanus.tlg.uci.edu/ Cf. Perseus: http://www.perseus.tufts.edu/hopper/ Translations of biblical citations are modifications of the King James Bible. For useful descriptions of Classical figures of speech, see Silva Rhetoricae: http://rhetoric.byu.edu/

Verses 1-4: Preamble

Verses 1-2

[ἐ]̄ ....... [ε]̄ άμμιν ۀκανε φερέςβιος ἐςθλοςυνάω[ν], [[.......]̄ άμμιν ۀκανεν. …
[ἐ]̄ .......]̄ has come to us, bringing life and all good things,
[.......]̄ has come to us!

Repetition, such as άμμιν ۀκανε … άμμιν ۀكأيν “he has come to us … he has come to us,” is a common formula for ecstatically announcing a divine presence. Compare, for example, the words of the Sibyl when Apollo has taken control of her (Aeneid 6.46): Deus ecce deus! “The god, behold the god!” (Some familiarity with Latin was expected from those in the legal profession, like

Clement A. Kuehn
Dioscorus, and the Aeneid was a standard learning text.) See also the repetition of the ecstatic Maenads’ cry when Dionysus arrives in Thebes (Greece). Here they are not announcing his arrival, but encouraging one another to join his ritual:

στόμα τ’ εὐφήμον ἄπας ἐξοσιούσθω.
tὰ νομισθέντα γὰρ αἰεὶ Διώνυσον ὑμνήσω. …
ἳτε βάκχαι, ἰτε βάκχαι,
Βρόμιον παῖδα θεὸν θεοῦ Διώνυσον κατάγουσαι …
ἄμα δ´ ἐπ´ εὐάσιμαι ἐπιβρεῖμει τοιάδ´ Ὦ ἰτε βάκχαι,
ὡ ἰτε βάκχαι

“And let everyone keep his mouth pure, speaking propitious things.
For I will celebrate Dionysus with hymns according to eternal custom. …
Go, Bacchae, go, Bacchae,
escorting the god Bromius, child of a god!” …
And among the Maenad cries, his voice rings deep:
“Go, Bacchae, go, Bacchae!”
(Euripides, Bacchae 70-72, 83-85, 152-153; translation by T. A. Buckley)

Although the corner of the Dioscorian papyrus and the beginning of verses 1 and 2 are missing, the epithet φέρέϲβιοϲ “life-bringing” clearly establishes the identity of the divinity: Christ. This epithet is stressed by its placement in the verse: right after the main caesura.

Clement A. Kuehn
In verse 1, the poem in its present state begins with a strong assonance of the vowel alpha, ἄµµιν ἵκανε, which is appropriate for a beginning. The assonance is stressed by the metrical ictus of the third foot, which falls on the long alpha of ἵκανε. And the poet immediately establishes his creativity and control of the language by apparently coining the hapax legomenon ἐϲθλοϲυνάω. The penultimate syllable of verse 1 (-νά-) has both the word accent and metrical ictus, echoing the alpha assonance at the beginning of the verse. The assonance is continued at the beginning of verse 2 and in the fifth foot (-ηϲ καὶ α-) where there is no elision and both alpha sounds are pronounced.

[minsterial symbol] : a Christian symbol that Dioscorus uses to begin his poems.

[........]c : The upper left corner of the papyrus is missing, so we cannot establish who “has come to us.” It might be that Maspero had an additional piece with ὅ to create ὅϲ. This is how he reads the papyrus, but such a piece no longer exists and he did not include a photographic plate. In explaining the surface level of meaning, various papyrologists and historians (beginning with the original editor) suggested that the word [Ιουϲτῖνος] filled the lacuna. This restoration would establish that the surface level was addressed to the Emperor Justin, and that the poem was written shortly after his inauguration in November 565. This restoration, however, is hypothetical, and a specific emperor is not necessary for the allegory to work. The subsequent description “bringing life” makes clear that Christ is the subject on the allegorical level (see the discussion below).

ἄµµιν ἵκανε … ἄµµιν ἵκανεν : By repeating “has come to us,” the poet firmly

Clement A. Kuehn
establishes that the Divine is now present at the liturgical service. This concept is based on the New Testament and the words of Christ: οὗ γὰρ εἰσιν δύο ἢ τρεῖς συνηγμένοι εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα, ἐκεῖ εἰμὶ ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν. “For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.” (Mt. 18:20) Repetition is also helpful in increasing the attention of an audience. One cannot ignore the phonetic similarity between ἄµµιν … ἄµµιν and ἀµὴν ἀµὴν, which Jesus used to begin an especially important statement. For example: ἀπεκρίθη Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ, Ἀµὴν ἀµὴν λέγω σοι, ἐὰν μή τις γεννηθῇ ἀνωθεν, οὐ δύναται ἵδειν τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. “Jesus answered and said unto him: ‘Verily verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God’.” (Jo. 3:3; cf. Jo. 1:51; etc.)

Without the repetition, Dioscorus uses the phrase οὕτωϲ ἄµµιν ἴκανεϲ “so you have come to us” in at least three other poems: Poem 11.46, 14.35, and 18.42; cf. 20.8 (Heitsch 3.46, 5.18, 13.11; cf. 2.8).

φερέςβιοϲ : The compound adjective “life-bringing” is placed in a strong position in the verse: right after the main caesura. The main caesura is feminine (κα

The word is not found in Homer, but the phrase φερέςβιοϲ υἱὸς “life-bringing Son” is used three times by Nonnus as an epithet for Christ in his Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John (Paraphrasis 5.105, 6.117, 8.92; cf. 6.99, 18.132). Nonnus was the most influential poet of the early Byzantine Era. In the

Clement A. Kuehn
poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus, a popular Christian theologian of the early Byzantine Era, the name Φερέϲβιοϲ is synonymous with the Logos (Epigrammata, Book 8, epigram 79, line 7; cf. Carmina de se ipso, page 1448, line 9).

ἐϲθλοϲυνάω[ν] : “bringing all good things”. The word is an hapax legomenon: it appears nowhere else in Greek literature and was probably coined by Dioscorus. It might be a genitive plural noun created from the hypothetical ἐσθλοσύνη (Saija, s.v.). It is then dependent on the preceding adjective φερέϲβιοϲ: “nutrimento di bene” (Saija) or “celui qui apporte la vie (les ressources) que fournissent ses bienfaisances” (Fournet, p. 569). MacCoull prefers using it as a participle: “bringer of good” (MacCoull, p. 73). The concept is biblical: πᾶσα δόσις ἀγαθή καὶ πᾶν δώρημα τέλειον ἀνωθεν ἐστιν καταβαίνον ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν φώτων … . “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above and cometh down from the Father of lights …. “ (Jac. 1:17)

The hapax ἐϲθλοϲυνάω[ν] has at its core the adjective ἐσθλός “good”, which is found in Homer. More significantly, Gregory of Nazianzus frequently uses the adjective ἐσθλός in his poetry to describe Christ. And in the tragedy Christus Patiens, which traditionally is ascribed to Gregory, we find the following verse used twice as a greeting for Christ (2098, 2538): Χαῖρ’, ἐσθλός ἐσθλοῦ Παῖ, Βασιλεῦ παντάναξ. “Greetings, good Son of the Good, King, Lord of all!”

Clement A. Kuehn
2 … ἐλευθερίηϲ καὶ ἀρωγη[ϲ]
3 [δεινὼν cf]αλμάτων λαθικηδέοϲ Ἥγαγε τέρψιν

... He has brought to mighty men
and very pleasing women the joy of help and freedom,
which banishes the woe of our terrible failings.

These three verses are joined grammatically into one sentence. Within the sentence, verses 2-3, whose subject is Christ, are interwoven by a complex genitive construction. These intertwined genitives will be recalled in verses 17-18, where Christ is described with vine imagery, alluding to his description of himself as a vine (Jo. 15:5; cf. 15:1). That is not the image created here. The tangled genitive construction in verses 2-3 recalls the entanglement of sin described in several biblical passages. See for example: Τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ ἡμᾶς Χριστὸς ἠλευθέρωσεν· στήκετε οὖν καὶ μὴ πάλιν ζυγὸ δουλείας ἐνέχεσθε. “Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.” (Col. 1:14; cf. Mc. 4:7; etc.) In the following Dioscorian verse, verse 4, the genitives are replaced by straightforward datives of interest (arranged in a chiasmic order). In the same way, the congregation of verse 4 is freed from their failings. This is a perfect blend of sense and style.

ἐλευθερίηϲ καὶ ἀρωγη[ϲ] / [δεινὼν cf]αλμάτων λαθικηδέοϲ : The restorations are by Maspero. He gives no reason for [δεινὼν cf], but says simply that the restoration is difficult. He translates: “son secours, qui fait

Clement A. Kuehn
oublier les malheurs.” It is interesting that, outside of Dioscorus, this noun-adjective pair appears only in the Typica Monastica: διὰ δὲ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν πεπραγμένων μοι δεινῶν σφαλμάτων “on account of the great number of terrible sins having been committed by me” (Typicon monasterii Theotoci Petritziotissae, sub auctore Gregorio Pacuriano, Chapter 1, lines 205-206).

As pointed out above, this is an intricate genitive construction. The first two nouns should be understood as an hendiadys: “helpful freedom”. The genitive construction in the following verse, [δεινῶν σφαλμάτων, grammatically depends upon the word ἐλευθερίηϲ and means literally “freedom from our terrible failings.” This is a standard biblical concept. Christ’s mission was to free the faithful from their sins. See for instance: ἐν ὧν ἔχομεν τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν, τὴν ἄφεσιν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν “in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins” (Col. 1:14). And: ἵνα τοὺς ὑπὸ νόμον ἐξαγοράσῃ ἵνα τὴν νίκεσθαι ἀπολάβωμεν “to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons” (Gal. 4:5). And also: ὅτι καὶ αὐτῇ ἡ κτίσις ἐλευθερωθῆσεται ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν τῆς δόξης τῶν τέκνων τοῦ θεοῦ. “Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.” (Rom. 8:21) In fact, Christ and the Spirit were closely associated with freedom in general: ὁ δὲ κύριος τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστιν· οὐ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα κυρίου, ἐλευθερία. “Now the Lord is that Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.” (II Cor. 3:17)

Part of the genitive construction involves a chiasmus that bridges two verses:

ελευθερίηϲ καὶ ἄρωγη[ϲ] / [δεινῶν σφαλμάτων λαθικηδέοϲ. Here the adjective λαθικηδέοϲ properly modifies the noun ἀρωγή[ϲ], but it actually modifies the entire hendiadys ἐλευθερίηϲ καὶ ἀρωγή[ϲ]. The chiasmus is created by the adjective-noun phrase [δεινῶν cφ]σφάλματων sandwiched in-between the noun-adjective phrase ἀρωγή[ϲ] ... λαθικηδέοϲ.

Clement A. Kuehn

cφ]σφάλματων: This is not the biblical word for sin, which is ἁμαρτία and which means literally “failure” or “fault”. The biblical phrase for “freedom from sins” or “remission of sins” is: ἡ ἁφέσις τῶν ἁμαρτίων. The noun here, σφάλμα, means literally “trip” or “stumble”. The biblical term for this concept is πρόσκομμα, which is sometimes used to express the temptation or cause of sin (Rom. 14:13) and sometimes used for the same concept as ἁμαρτία (Rom. 9:33). Dioscorus—like Nonnus, Apollinaris, Eudocia, and other early Byzantine writers—used an epic vocabulary for Christian themes and avoided biblical terminology. Here, however, the term σφάλμα is not found in the Bible, and is also not found in Homer or Nonnus. But it is used frequently by early Christian writers—to express the concept of sin. For example, in the Christus Patiens, Gregory of Nazianzus writes: Γινώσκομεν σφάλματα, σὺ δὲ παρόρα. “We recognize our failings—you, our forgiveness.” (2562; cf. 821) λαθικηδέοϲ: This compound adjective is not uncommon, and is found in Homer, Nonnus, and other secular and Christian writers. It means literally “banishing care”. In Homer it describes the suckling breast (Il. 22.83); in Nonnus’s Dionysiaca, it describes wine and Dionysus the god of wine (7.339, 19.54, 21.234).

In Poem 17, it is singular and modifies the noun closest to it: ἀρωγῆ[ϲ]. But in fact, it describes the entire concept found in the hendiadys ἐλευθερίηϲ καὶ ἀρωγῆ[ϲ]. The compound adjective λαθικηδέοϲ also gives us a second possibility for the genitives [δεινῶν ως] ἀλμάτων: they could be objective genitives dependent on the second element of the compound (-κηδέοϲ), which then means “banishing the care about …”. The poet now offers us two grammatically correct meanings: “care-banishing freedom from our terrible failings” and “freedom that banishes the care about our terrible failings”. Both concepts, in the end, mean the same. What is important is that with the adjective λαθικηδέοϲ the poet has turned a standard biblical concept—freedom from sins—into a personal, subjective emotion, emphasizing the piety of the congregation: “release from our guilt about our terrible failings.”

εγαγε τέρψιν: The compilation of genitives is epexegetic: the genitive construction is in apposition to and describes the τέρψιν “joy”, which the subject has brought. The joy arises out of the freedom from failures, and replaces the care.

[ἀνδράςι τε κρατ]εροῖϲ πολυτ[ρ]πέϲιν ἤδε γυναίξι[ϲ]: The restoration of the beginning was suggested by Maspero, who did not explain. The exact phrase ἀνδράςι κρατεροῖϲ appears nowhere else in Dioscorus’s poetry or in Greek literature, but ἀνὴρ κρατερός is a common epic pair. See for example: ἀνδρὶ δαμεῖς κρατερῷ (Il. 3.429), ἀνδρὶ πάρα κρατερῷ (Il. 24.212), etc.

The congregation is described in heroic terms: literally “to strong men and very pleasing women.” This is a nicely balanced verse, using a chiasmic construction. The opposite genders are placed at opposite ends of the line, with their corresponding adjectives placed within: A B B A. The adjective describing the women, πολυτερπέϲιν, echoes the noun in the preceding verse, τέρψιν. In this way the poet suggests that, on the allegorical level, as the joy is a gift from Christ, so also the pleasing nature is his gift. In other words, the adjective is proleptic. Only after the women have received the joy of freedom from their failings (ἐλευθερίηϲ ... σφαλμάτων ... τέρψιν), only after they have been washed free of their sins through Baptism, do they become completely pleasing to him (πολυτερπέϲιν).

κρατερῶϲ : “strong”, “stout”, “mighty”. The adjective is usually used by Homer for physical strength in war: Ἀγαμέ mıνων, / ἀμφότερον βασίλευϲ τ’ ἀγαθὸϲ κρατερὸϲ τ’ ἀἷχµητὴϲ “Agamemnon, / both a good king and a mighty warrior” (Il. 3.178-179; cf. 2.515, 6.97, 16.624, etc.). And that is the usage in Nonnus’s Dionysiaca (21.11) The adjective is not found in the Septuagint or the New Testament. The term κρατερόϲ, however, is related to the verb κρατέω, which can mean “to overcome” or “to endure”. The Dioscorian adjective thus suggests the New Testament admonition to overcome temptation and to persevere: it is the enduring believer that is rewarded with the crown. The standard New Testament terms for this concept are ὑπομένω and προσκαρτερέω. See for example: Μακάριοϲ ἄνηρ ὑπομένει πειρασµὸν, ὃτι δόκιµοϲ γενόµενοϲ λήµµεται τὸν στέφανον τῆϲ ζωῆϲ, ὃν ἐπηγεύλατο τοῖϲ ἀγαπώϲιν αὐτῶν. “Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.” (Jac. 1:12) See also: τῇ ἐλπίδι καίροντεϲ, τῇ θλίψεi ὑποµένοντεϲ, τῇ προσευχῇ προσκαρτεροῦντεϲ “as regards hope,
The infinitive and participle of κρατέω were used by early Byzantine writers to denote perseverance in the Faith or in a way of life. For example, Joannes Malalas, an older contemporary of Dioscorus, used the phrase κρατήσαντες τὸ ἀρχαῖον ἔθος ἦς τῆς νῦν “having persevered in the old way to the present day” (Chronographia, page 180, line 9). The infinitive was used in a similar sense by Gelasius Cyzicenus, the fifth-century Church historian: τὴν … κρατεῖν πίστιν “to persevere in the faith” (Historia ecclesiastica, Book 1, proem., section 10, line 4). And equally important, the Dioscorian term would have echoed the superlative and ubiquitous epithet for Christ: παντοκράτωρ “almighty”.

πολυτερπής: The adjective πολυτερπής is rare and thus draws attention to itself. It was not used by Homer and was used only once by Nonnus, in his Dionysiaca. But it was used at least five times by Proclus, the fifth-century Neoplatonic philosopher, in his commentaries to Plato. (Proclus wrote not only commentaries to Classical works but also essays, and even hymns to pagan gods.) Proclus was influential in Greek, Roman, and Islamic philosophy and had a strong impact on Christian mystical writers, especially Ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite. Proclus worked in Alexandria for the early part of his career, where he taught Ammonius, who is in turn taught John Philoponus. Philoponus was a Christian philosopher and possibly a teacher.
of Dioscorus. In his surviving works, Proclus uses the adjective πολυτερπής three times as an epithet for Eros, a metaphysical emanation from the One.
ALLEGORICAL ART
IN THE EARLY BYZANTINE ERA:
CHURCHES

It would be beneficial to contrast the icons in Figures 1-5 with the symbolism in the Ravenna mosaic of Emperor Justinian and his court. Nothing similar has survived for Justin II, but the attitudes and vision represented by this artwork would have existed also at the beginning of Justin’s reign. Here, Christ is not being portrayed as an emperor, but the emperor is being portrayed as Christ. The emperor Justinian was sixty-four years old when this mosaic was completed (born in 482) and had never visited Italy, thus this mosaic was not a life-like representation. It was funded by the banker Julianus Argentarius and overseen by the archbishop Maximian. It was influenced by the icons of the period, and its propaganda effect had the highest priority. The mosaic was a statement of imperial power.

As the Theotokos in the Coptic tapestry is surrounded by medallions of the twelve apostles (Figure 5), Justinian is surrounded by twelve men. Three of the four on his left are ecclesiastics, including Maximian, the Archbishop of Ravenna from 545 to 553. The fourth on the left and the two on his right are secular officials, including perhaps the banker Argentarius on his immediate right. They are flanked by six soldiers. The mosaic is saying that Justinian’s power is supported by the Church, money, and the palace, and it is backed by military might. One soldier carries a shield with the Christian Chi-Rho abbreviation, which would remind the viewer of Emperor Constantine. Thus Justinian’s power is also backed by history. Although Justinian was still very much alive when this mosaic was completed, his crowned head is surrounded by a corona.

Clement A. Kuehn
Justinian is carrying, perhaps, an empty basket that would have held the bread during the Offertory of the Eucharistic Rite, thus inviting a comparison to Christ. The mosaic is recalling the times when Christ compared his human body to bread (Mt. 26:26; cf. Jo. 6:32-58; etc.). By showing that the basket is empty, the mosaic is contrasting Justinian with the Christ that divinely and miraculously fed bread to five thousand men (Mt. 14:15-21; Mc. 6:35-44; etc.). Unlike Christ in the sixth-century icons, Justinian is not carrying the jewel-studded Bible: an ecclesiastical authority is. And unlike Christ in the icons, Justinian is not throned, not being carried aloft, and not offering a divine blessing. He is standing firmly and grimly on the ground. The coronae here and on Empress Theodora in the nearby mosaic are related to the coronae seen in pagan art and literature: they connote extraordinary power but not necessarily heavenliness (cf. Il. 5.5 ff., 18.203 ff., etc.).

There is little hierarchy in the composition. The emperor is standing in the center of the image (note the quadrilaterals above), but all the men are standing on the green earth and their faces are level. Their feet are intertwined. The statement of the mosaic is clear: Justinian is at the center, but is not the source of this awesome power. The power is created by the clergy, the palace, and the army. The viewer is not being invited to feel repentance, make a petition, or take away grace and sing a hymn of joy: it is not a devotional icon. The viewer is told by the mosaic to be awed by the power generated by this assembly. And that is all. Justinian is wearing a heavy crown, which raises him above the rest, but his expression reveals a man accustomed to the burden of authority on earth. Unlike the icons of Christ, the eyes of Justinian are fixed. There is no serenity.

Clement A. Kuehn

The Basilica of San Apollinare Nuovo was originally dedicated in 504 to Christ the Redeemer. The thirteen small mosaics in the top zone may date to the original church. They show scenes in the life of Christ. On the left, he is always young, unbearded, and dressed as an emperor; on the right, he is always bearded and presented as the “Man of Sorrows”, recalling a vision found at Isaiah 53:3-6: “He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.” In the middle zone, created c. 526, one sees saints, prophets, and the evangelists.

The bottom zone was created in 561 during the reign of Emperor Justinian, who in absentia rededicated the church to “Saint Martin in Golden Heaven”. The wall mosaics present an allegory similar to that seen in the icons from the 6th century, where the spiritual Christ is presented as a Byzantine emperor in his palace. At the center of the zone, Christ and the Mother of God are seated on jewelled thrones and flanked by scepter-wielding angels. At the two extreme ends one sees ornate palace architecture, representing the Palatium of Theodoric (on the right) and the Ravenna port of Classe (on the left). On Christ’s left is a procession of twenty-six martyred saints in the clothing of Roman senators (toga praetexta): each has received from him an individualized, ornate crown. On the Virgin Mary’s right is a procession of twenty-two virgin martyrs in elaborate clothing; each also has received a crown.

Unlike the nearby mosaic of Justinian at the Basilica of San Vitale, Christ is depicted as the source of all heavenly and earthly power. Similar to the icon of the Ancient of Days, the angels hold up their right hands. Christ holds up his right hand in blessing. In his left hand, he holds what appears to be a double scepter of power over heaven and earth.

The allegory here has taken on a new dimension. The saints, Christ, and the Theotokos in heaven are still depicted as kings, the emperor, and the empress, but there is a new realism and local character.

Clement A. Kuehn
Wadi El Natrun was a center for monastic Christianity in Upper Egypt and attracted followers from around the Byzantine World. Its alternate name, Scetes, is derived from the Greek term for “the ascetics”. In addition to becoming the home of several important Christian writers, it served as a refuge for Coptic Patriarchs of Alexandria. Among the many monasteries that arose at Wadi El Natrun, one was founded by Syrian monks in the 6th century and consecrated to the Theotokos. According to tradition, the monastery was designed on the basis of Noah’s ark. Most of the monasteries at Wadi El Natrun were destroyed or looted during the Arab conquest of Egypt in the 7th century. But the fortified monasteries survived, as did the Syrian monastery.

The fresco in Figure 12 was only recently discovered during restoration work between 1991 and 1999. It could have been created as part of the original 6th century church, but scholarly opinions vary. The fresco reveals an allegory similar to that seen in the previous Figures from the 6th century. On the surface level of meaning, the Virgin Mary is enthroned and surrounded by ornate palace architecture. She is wearing makeup. She is being greeted by the archangel Gabriel, who carries a scepter. She is flanked by four prophets dressed as court nobility: Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. As in the mosaics at San Apollinare Nuovo, there is an increased realism and local character. The palace architecture behind the Virgin Mary is taking on a vivid reality. The four Hebrew prophets that foretold the Virgin Birth are unrolling papyrus scrolls to reveal the pertinent verses—written in the Coptic language.

What makes this allegory even more fascinating and complex is that the deeper level of meaning is not a scene in heaven: it is an historical event in the life of Mary of Nazareth.

This image, which is not monumental but a portable icon, was found in Egypt during the archaeological excavations of a monastery at Bawit. Painted in the late 6th – early 7th century it is in excellent condition. St. Menas (285 – c. 309) was the abbot of the monastery there. He was originally a high-ranking officer in the Roman army, but after only three years of service, left the army and began a hermetic life in Egypt. During his stay in the desert, he saw a revelation of angels crowning martyrs with glorious diadems. He also heard a voice saying that he would receive three immortal crowns: one for his celibacy, one for his ascetic lifestyle, and one for his martyrdom.

The allegory in Figure 14 is subdued, as in Figure 1, but also shows the new realism and local character evident at Ravenna. On the deeper level, this is a scene in heaven. On the surface level of meaning, there is a mixture of history with fictional royalty. Christ has the short brown beard of a young man; Menas has the long grey beard of an old man. Christ is wearing imperial purple. St. Menas is wearing over a brown tunica perhaps the toga praetexta of a Roman senator. Christ is carrying a jewel- and pearl-studded codex, while Menas is holding a tiny scroll that may contain the rules of his monastery. The concept of religious rule is emphasized by the Coptic inscription that reads “Abbot Mena, superior.”

Emphasizing the spirituality of the scene, their eyes are not focused on any particular point and both men look remarkably serene. This serenity is enhanced by the rolling hills behind, from which their nimbi seem to be rising like twin suns. In a strict hierarchical order, Christ’s head is slightly higher than St. Menas’s.

What is most striking in this icon is the relaxed arm and hand that Christ has placed around the shoulder of Menas. Therefore, unlike the icon in Figure 1, Christ cannot give a salutary blessing. Instead, Menas does so with his right hand. The physical language is one of geniality and conveys the message of heavenly kinship and affection that was stressed by Christ in the Gospels (Mt. 5:45; Jo. 15:15; etc.). The seriousness of the dynastic temple paintings has been replaced by the childlike innocence and exuberance typical of Coptic art.

Clement A. Kuehn
COMMENTARY TO POEM 17 RECTO

Verses 5-10: Christ

Verses 5-8

5 [λῶιόν ἡϲτιν ἐὸν παναοίδιμον οὐνομα µέλψαι],
7 [υμε]ύϲαι νέον νία πολυκηπτρον παλλατίου
8 [καὶ πολυκυδήεντα φιλόχριϲτον βαϲιλῆα.]

[It is desirable to celebrate his name, sung by all.]

Because he is grace and happiness
and the beloved flower of eloquence,
sing a hymn to the young Son of the palace of many scepters,
and to the very glorious King, who loves Christ:

There is a break between papyrus fragments A and B. Because there is an infinitive in verse 7, the original editor Maspero assumed that a verse was lost in the lacuna, which would have contained a main verb to support the infinitive. He supplied this verse from Poem 6, verse 10 (MacCoull p. 123, verse 8). Like Homer and Nonnus, Dioscorus repeated verses. (In fact, these repeated verses enabled Maspero in 1911, while working on Dioscorian fragments in Cairo, to identify a Dioscorian poem in the Berlin Museum.) It is not necessary, however, to assume that a verse dropped out here. Dioscorus could be using the infinitive as an imperative, which would not require a supporting finite verb. An infinitive used as an imperative is a common construction in Homer. Note, for example, the two imperative infinitives: μὴ ποτὲ καὶ σὺ γυναικὶ περ ἥπιος εἶναι / μηδ’ οἱ μῦθοιν ἀπαντά πιφαυσκέμεν. “Never be indulgent, even you to your wife! Do not reveal to her every thought!” (Od. 11.441-442). And in the Classical Era, Aristophanes (Comicus) has: ἀκούετε λεῴ· κατὰ τὰ πάτρια τοὺς Χοᾶς / πίνειν … “Listen, people! Drink the pitchers like our ancestors did … !” (Acharnenses 1000-1001) Dioscorus had a predilection for comedy: Old and New Athenian Comedy manuscripts survived in his archive, and he used comedy constructions in his own poetry, such as exaggerated compound words (see Poem 40).

Clement A. Kuehn

[Dioscorus seems to like this phrase: it appears in at least three other poems (Poem 9.6, 11.13, and 19.7; Heitsch 3.13, 11.6, 20.6; MacCoul p. 105.6, 106.6, 137.13).]

This is a musical phrase. Note the alliteration, synchysis, and consonance that tie it together: χάρ - χάρ and A (χάρις) B (καὶ) A (χάρμα) B (καὶ) and χ- κ- χ- κ- . The two nouns are almost synonymous, but the first tends to refer to the source while the second tends to refer to the result: the favor given and the joy that arises.

Dioscorus uses the same verse at Poem 9.6 (Heitsch 20.6; MacCoull p. 105, verse 6).

Clement A. Kuehn
person, person’s image, or thing (Od. 2.12, Il. 14.183, etc.). In a concrete sense, Homer uses it to express a “favor” bestowed on someone (Il. 5.211, etc.). It is also used by Homer as a personal noun. In mythology, there were three Graces (Χάριτες Il. 14.267, etc.), but Homer and Nonnus also use the singular (Il. 18.382; Dionysiaca 2.330, 11.374, etc.).

In Christian literature, Nonnus uses the term to express the spiritual favor that is bestowed by Christ (Paraphrasis 1.54, 11.150) and the gratitude for the spiritual favor bestowed by God (Paraphrasis 6.37, 9:127). In the New Testament, among other meanings of the word, it is used for God’s favor to Christ: Τὸ δὲ παιδίον ἠύξανεν καὶ ἐκραταιοῦτο πληρούμενον σοφία, καὶ χάρις θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ’ αὐτό. And the child grew and waxed strong, filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him.” (Lc. 2:40) And in the Gospel of John, the word is closely associated with Christ and his mission: ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ πληρώματος αὐτοῦ ἥμεις πάντες ἔλαβομεν καὶ χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος· ὅτι ὁ νόμος διὰ Μωϋσέως ἐδόθη, ἡ χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐγένετο. “And of his fulness we have all received, and grace for grace. For the law was given by Moses, grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.” (Jo. 1:16-17)

On the allegorical level, Dioscorus uses the word in a metaphorical sense. “He is grace” means that Christ is full of grace and the source of grace. Cf. the construction at verse 27: “You are the crown.” Dioscorus is not saying that Christ is one of the three Graces, but the concept of one from the Trinity is a connotation here.

Clement A. Kuehn
χάρμα: this noun is related to the verb χαίρω, “to be glad”, whose perfect passive participle is κεχαρμένος, “having been made glad”.

Homer uses this noun in an objective sense, as “the source of joy” (Il. 17.636, 23.342), and also in a subjective sense, as “joy” or “delight” received (Od. 19.471). Nonnus in his Paraphrase uses the word exclusively in the latter sense, and almost exclusively for Christ’s happiness, shared with the faithful: For example at Paraphrase 15.42-44 we find:

ὑμῖν δ’ ἐμπέδα ταῦτα φίλα φρονέων ἁγορεύω, ὑμείων ἵνα χάρμα πέλοι καὶ πάσιν ἐν ὑμῖν χάρμα πολυσφρήγιστον ἐμὸν τετελεσμένον εἴη.

I, thinking kindly, say these sure things to you so that joy might be yours and my joy, secured by all of you, might be complete.

ἐὐπής ἃ[λ]ῳ ἄνθος: “the beloved flower of eloquence” is a metaphor with three possible meanings, all of which could be implied by the poet simultaneously. On the surface level, it seems to mean that the subject is well-liked and speaks exceptionally well (genitive of characteristic). It also suggests that the subject’s talent is the apex to which all good speakers strive. On the allegorical level, the phrase says that Christ is the Logos, who is beloved by God.

ἐὐπής: the word means literally “good speech” and implies “beauty of language”, “eloquence”, and “welcome words”. It is not used by Homer, but three times by Nonnus in his Dionysiaca (13.51, 25.262, 41.376) and by other epic writers of the early Byzantine Era. These include Eudocia (De martyrio sancti Cypriani 2.212) and two of Dioscorus’s fellow poets from the Thebaid: Pamprepius (P.Vindob. 29788 A–C, Fragment 4, line 19) and Christodorus (AP 2.381, 411, 415). The word is also found in the poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus (Carmina moralia, column 912, line 10; Carmina de se ipso, page 1257, line 3). All of these poets exerted an influence, direct or indirect, on Dioscorus. For example, note the verbal parallels between Dioscorus here and Christodorus in an ecphrasis in Book 2 of the Greek Anthology. Christodorus describes a statue of Herodotus (the historian from Halicarnassus) and notes how he had eloquently written in a dialect similar to Homer (377-381):

Nor did I fail to notice the divine nightingale of Halicarnassus, wise Herodotus, who had dedicated to the nine Muses whatever deeds of ancient men the two lands had brought forth, whatever creeping time had seen, he having mixed with eloquence the flower of the Ionic dialect.

This figurative word, “blossom” or “flower”, is found in Homer and Nonnus. It is also found in biblical literature, in which it is frequently used to symbolize the transient glory of life. For instance: ἄνθρωπος, ὡσεὶ χόρτος αἱ ἡµέραι αὐτοῦ; / ὡσεὶ ἄνθος τοῦ ἄγροι, οὕτως εξανθήσει. “As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.” (Ps. 102/103:15) And: Πᾶσα σάρξ χόρτος, καὶ πᾶσα δόξα ἄνθρωποι ὡς ἄνθος χόρτου· ἐξηράνθη ὁ χόρτος, καὶ τὸ ἄνθος ἐξέπεσεν, τὸ δὲ ῥῆµα τοῦ θεοῦ ἠµῶν μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. “All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall remain for ever. (Is. 40: 6-8) In the same sense, the word ἄνθος was also a favorite among early Christian writers.

More important for our study is that it was often used by Proclus in the sense of “the apex”. Proclus, the most influential philosopher of Late Antiquity, discussed in depth the Triad of the One, the Intellect, and the Soul. The transcendent Divinity was the ἄνθος τῆς τριάδος (Theologia Platonica, vol. 4, page 106, line 3). And again using ἄνθος, Proclus spoke about the apex of being (ἄνθος τοῦ ὄντος καὶ ἀκρότης καὶ κέντρον Theologia Platonica, vol. 3, page 14, lines 13-14), the apex of the intellect (τὸ ἄνθος τοῦ νοῦ In Platonis Alcibiadem i, section 248, line 3), and the apex of the soul (πάσης ἡµῶν τῆς ψυχῆς ἄνθος· Eclogae de philosophia Chaldaica, Fragment 4, line 52).

On the allegorical level, Christ is the Logos, which is the Word of God, which is the apex of all speech. For Christ as both the Word and the child of God, see the beginning of Nonnus’s Paraphrase (1.1-5):

Ἄχρονος ἦν, ἀκίχητος, ἐν ἀρρήτω λόγος ἀρχῇ, ἰσοφυὴς γενετήρος ὀμήλικος υἱὸς ἀμήτωρ,

Clement A. Kuehn
In the unspeakable beginning was the Word, outside of time, beyond reach,
Son without a mother, like his Father, and the Word was the child of the self-born God,
light from light;
He was indivisible from his Father, enthroned on a throne without bounds;
And the Word was God, of high birth.

For the eloquence of God, see ὡς γλυκέα τῷ λάρυγγί μου τὰ λόγιά σου, / ὑπὲρ μέλι καὶ κηρίον τῷ στόματί μου. “How sweet are thy words unto my taste, yea sweeter than honey and honeycomb to my mouth.” (Ps. 118/119:103)

Verse 7

[?type]ύσαι νέον ὑῖα πολυκήπτρου παλατίου
sing a hymn to the young Son of the palace of many scepters,

In its musicality, skillfulness, and seeming simplicity, verse 7 is one of the most accomplished in the poem. The alliteration is noteworthy. In the entire verse, there is a preponderance of nu and upsilon sounds, which onomatopoeically suggest the sound of hymning. And beginning after the main caesura, in contrast to the mellow chanting sound, there is alliteration of pi and tau sounds, which onomatopoeically suggest the scepters pounding on the palace floor. The two phrases νέον ἕια and πολυσκήπτρου παλλατίου are contrasted further by word length: two syllables, two syllables || four syllables, four syllables. The short and spry words νέον ἕια highlight the youth, while the ponderous πολυσκήπτρου παλλατίου speak of authority. Dioscorus was an expert at euphony.

[ὑμνε]ῦςαί: Although previous editors supplied a verse (verse 5) to give the infinitive a supporting verb, such a restoration is not necessary from a papyrus or grammatical point of view. The imperative infinitive attracts attention because it is less common and is in a strong initial position, thereby the command is made more emphatic. This is a second person singular imperative, highlighting the collective nature of the singing congregation.

νέον ἕια: This phrase could mean either “new son” or “young son”, and both meanings could be implied by the poet. The standard phrase in epic poetry is φιλος υἱός (II. 19.327, Od. 6.64, etc.), but Dioscorus had already used this adjective in the previous phrase: φιλος υἱός ἄνθος, / ὑμνεὺςαί νέον ἕια “beloved flower, / hymn the young son.” From what I could find in Greek literature, the precise phrase νέος υἱός is not common. In epic poetry, it is found among the Fragments of Hesiod (10a.55) and nine times in Nonnus (Dionysiaca 5.207, 8.355, etc.), where it means “young son”. In biblical literature, it does not appear in the New Testament, but a variation is found in the Septuagint translation of Exodus, where it refers to a “young son”, not a “new son”: ὁ δὲ θεράπων Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Ναυν νέος οὐκ ἐξεπορεύετο ἐκ τῆς σκηνῆς. “But his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.” (33:11). The phrase was also used by Justin Martyr: καὶ οὐ μὴ γένηται ἑτέροις ἡμέραις καὶ πρεσβύτης ὃς οὐκ ἐμπλήσει τὸν χρόνον αὐτοῦ. ἔσται γὰρ ὁ νέος υἱὸς ἐκατὸν ἔτων. “And there will no longer be one tottering in age, or an old man that will not fill out his time: for his young son will be one hundred years old.” (Dialogus cum Tryphone, chapter 81, section 1, line 10) A variation of the phrase is found in Epiphanius: νέος τοῦ εἶναι υἱός “a son young in existence” (Acoratus, chapter 71, section 5 bis; Panarion, vol. 3, page 324, line 28; page 325, line 1). And there are other similar variations.

Clement A. Kuehn

A different meaning is found in Christus Patiens, attributed to Gregory of Nazianzus. Christ is speaking to his mother from the cross, and tells her that John will be her “new son” (727-729):

"Ἰδ’, ὦ γυναικῶν ἐξ ἅπασῶν βελτίων,
ὁ παρθένος πάρεστιν υἱός σοι νέος.
Look, O you better than all women,
A virgin is present, a new son for you.

On the allegorical level, both meanings “young” and “new” are appropriate. Traditionally, Christ was not old, perhaps thirty years old or less, when he died. Historically, the date of birth might have been A.D. 6, when the Census of Quirinius was taken, and the date of death had to be after A.D. 26, when Pontius Pilate was appointed governor of Judaea, but before A.D. 36, when Pontius Pilate was removed. Roughly between 20 and 30 years old.
Christ was also a “new” man when he returned to his Father in heaven: he had been changed by the Incarnation. According to Anastasius of Sinai, who wrote an allegorical exegesis of Genesis at the end of the 7th century, the angels pointed out his change in appearance. Anastasius, obviously, could not have influenced Dioscorus. Nevertheless, Anastasius relied heavily on early Christian authors from Alexandria to write his Hexaemeron. In Book 4 he writes:

... τοὺς δὲ ἀστέρας ἄνωθεν ἐκ τοῦ στερεώματος, λέγω δὴ τοὺς ἁγίους ἀγέλους, ἀτενίζοντας καὶ ὁρῶντας αὐτὸν ἄνω πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἀνατρέχοντα καὶ θάττον ἅπαντας προσυπαντῶντας καὶ προσκυνοῦντας καὶ χορεύοντας καὶ λέγοντας τοῖς ὑπερτάτοις αὐτῶν ἄρχουσιν: Ἄρατε πύλας οἱ ἄρχοντες ἡ ἔρνην ... Ἐπετάσθη διπτέρυξ, Θεὸς ὁ οὐ καὶ ἄνθρωπος, ἐπὶ πτερύγων ἀνέων, πνευμάτων ἀσωμάτων ἑξαπτερύγων.

... and the stars of the firmament above—I am speaking about the holy angels—strained and watched Christ, as he hurried up toward them. As soon as they had all received him, they prostrated themselves and danced and sang and said to their highest leaders: “You, our leaders raise the gates! ... Now like the rising sun [he enters] the heaven of heaven. ... With two wings—both God and man—he has flown on the wings of the winds, the incorporeal spirits with six wings.” (Book 4, chapter 5, section 8)

πολυκήπτρου παλλατίου: Literally “of the many-sceptered Palatium”. The rare adjective πολύσκηπτρος appears only in poetry and not before the Byzantine Era. Outside of Poem 17, I have found only three occurrences of the word. The phrase πολυσκήπτρου βασιλῆος was used by Dioscorus’s contemporaries Paul the Silentiary and Agathias to refer to Justinian and Justin II respectively, where it may have suggested their rule over the Eastern and Western halves of the empire (Descriptio Sanctae Sophiae 281; Anthologia Graeca, Book 4, epigram 3, line 63). The phrase πολυσκήπτρων γενετήρων was used once by Juliana Anicia to refer to her father Valentinian III and her grandfather Theodosius II (Anthologia Graeca, Book 1, epigram 10, line 11). The related word μονόσκηπτρος was used only twice: once by Aeschylus and once by Nonnus (to refer to Tiberius during the trial of Jesus).

Clement A. Kuehn

It is significant that Dioscorus does not apply the adjective to the person of the emperor, as in the examples above, but transfers it to the place of rule: the palace. On the allegorical level, this suggests heaven, where the scepters could pertain to the angels (see Figures 2, 5, 12, and 13) or to the Trinity. St. Paul describes the Son, a divine speaker, arriving in heaven and inheriting God’s kingship:

ἐπ’ ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν τούτων ἐλάλησεν ἡμῖν ἐν υἱῷ, ὃς ἐθηκεν κληρονόμον πάντων, δι’ οὗ καὶ ἐποίησεν τοὺς αἰώνας· ὃς ἐθηκεν ἐν υἱῷ τῆς δύναμεως αὐτοῦ, καθαρισμὸν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ποιησάμενος ἐκάθισεν ἐν δεξιᾷ τῆς ἐνθυτητος μέγας τῆς βασιλείας.
In these last days he hath spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds. The Son, being the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high ... . But unto the Son he saith: “Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. And the scepter of righteousness is the scepter of thy kingdom. (Hebr. 1:2-8)

Yet Dioscorus’s πολυσκήπτρου παλλατίου most likely refers to the saints. In both Christian literature and art, the saints were represented as kings or royalty in a palace. A biblical image that relates to this phrase and might have influenced Dioscorus’s imagery is a vision of the kings that surround God in heaven:

εὐθέως ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι καὶ ἰδοὺ θρόνος ἐκεῖνο ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν θρόνον καθήμενος ... καὶ κυκλόθηκεν τοῦ θρόνου θρόνους εἴκοσι τέσσαρες, καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς θρόνους εἴκοσι τέσσαρας πρεσβυτέρους καθημένους περιβεβλημένους ἐν ἅμα τὸς λευκῶν, καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς κεφαλὰς αὐτῶν στεφάνους χρυσοὺς.

And immediately I was in the spirit. And behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne. ... And round about the throne were four and twenty thrones: and upon the thrones I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment, and on their heads crowns of gold. (Apoc. 4:2-4)

Clement A. Kuehn
The twenty-four elders are the patriarchs of the twelve Hebrew tribes and the twelve apostles. The twenty-four golden crowns give a sense that the heavenly palace has many kings. As to the scepters of the saints and the power they inherit, the Apocalypse again presents an impressive image:

καὶ ὁ νικῶν καὶ ὁ τηρῶν ἀχρί τέλους τὰ ἔργα μου, δώσω αὐτῷ ἐξουσίαν ἐπὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν, καὶ ποιμανεῖ αὐτούς ἐν ράβδῳ σιδηρᾷ, ώς τὰ σκεύη τὰ κεραμικὰ συντρίβεται, ώς κἀγὼ ἐξέληφα παρὰ τοῦ πατρός μου, καὶ δώσω αὐτῷ τὸν ἀστέρα τὸν πρωϊνόν.

And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations. And he shall rule them with a rod of iron—as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken—even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star. (2:26-28)

John uses the term ῥάβδος; Dioscorus uses the term σκῆπτρον. The poet avoids using the vocabulary of the New Testament, but the imagery is parallel.

παλλατίου: In contrast to the adjective πολυκήπτρου, which appears only in poetry, this term appeared only in prose before Dioscorus. For this and several more reasons, the word παλλατίου does not fit well in the verse here. It does not fit metrically. The real rhythm is πὰλ λα | τι ου. Even if Dioscorus had used one lambda, which is the more common spelling, the first alpha is still long. But Dioscorus is trying to make the word fit a | — — pattern. Another reason why the word does not fit into the verse is that παλλάτιον is a Latin word, Palatium or Pallatium, which is one of the seven hills of Rome. Augustus had his residence on this hill, and after Augustus, the word could be applied to any palace. Dioscorus’s spelling of the word with two lambda is found elsewhere, but is unusual in Greek. It may have been taken directly from the lexicon of rhetorical terms created by Eudemus in the second century A.D.: Παλλάτιον: ὁ Ῥωμαῖων βασιλικὸς οἶκος ἀπὸ τοῦ Πάλλαντος. “Pallatium: the royal house of the Romans, from the word Pallas [the son of Evander].” (Περὶ λέξεων ῥητορικῶν, Folio 171, line 10). The two lambda are also found in a papyrus from the Hermopolite nome in Egypt, written in the seventh century: ἐποίκ(ιον) Παλλατ[i]ου (SPP 10 45, line 4). The double lambda can also be found in Coptic papyri (see H. Hyvernat, Les Actes des martyrs de l’Égypte, 1, 4, 8, etc.). The spelling with one lambda is common in Greek prose and in the papyri.

Clement A. Kuehn

It seems that by choosing a word and a spelling that are clearly out-of-place, Dioscorus is emphasizing the allegorical level, where the palace of many scepters is not in Constantinople, Rome, or Ravenna—but in heaven.

Verse 8

καὶ πολὺ κυδήνητα φιλόχριϲτον βαϲιλῆα:
and to the very glorious King, who loves Christ:

Whereas in verse 7 Dioscorus focused on the Son, his inheritance of the kingship, and his sharing of the kingship with the saints, verse 8 briefly turns its attention to the Father and King. As pointed out in the discussion above, the usual phrase in epic literature was φίλος υἱός “beloved son” (Il. 19.327, Od. 6.64, etc.). Dioscorus wrote νέον υἱα “young son” in verse 7 because φίλος had been used in verse 6: φ[i]λ[o]γ[α]υ[νθο][c] “beloved flower”. In verse 8 we find out who the “beloved flower” is: φιλόχριϲτον “who loves Christ”. And who is doing the cherishing: the βαϲιλῆα, “the King”, his Father, God. With a small conjunction followed by a phrase of three massive words, Dioscorus has filled out an entire hexameter verse, thus giving considerable weight to the image of God as King.

καὶ πολυ[κυδήεντα : Maspero’s restoration of the beginning of the verse was [τον πολυ][κυδήεντα, which makes the son the one that loves the king, who loves Christ. This works on the surface level, where the poem is addressed to a Christian emperor, but it is awkward on the allegorical level. So I have restored [καὶ πολυ][κυδήεντα, which makes the King, who is the Father, the one that loves Christ. This restoration is harmonious with the rest of the poem on the allegorical level, and works on the surface level too, where the young son of the palace with many scepters is now the new emperor.

The rare adjective πολυκυδήεις is found in two other poems by Dioscorus (Poems 18.26, 20.28; Heitsch 2.28, 5.2; MacCoull p. 135, verse 28; p. 91, verse 2). It is found nowhere else in Greek literature—except in the epic paraphrase of the Psalms. (In the Anthologia Graeca, the word is found three times, but in other forms: πολυκυδής, πολύκυδος, and πολυκύδιστος.) This paraphrase is now referred to as the Homeric Psalter (Joseph Golega, Der homerische Psalter, Ettal 1960) or Metaphrasis Psalmorum (Arthur Ludwich, Leipzig 1912). It is ascribed to Apollinaris Laodicenus (ob. c. 390), but it was probably composed by someone else, who has not been identified. The adjective

Clement A. Kuehn
πολυκυδήεις appears at Psalter 10.7, 63.20, 88.4, and 97.4. The correspondences between the Homeric Psalter and Dioscorus’s Poem 17, also written in an Homeric style, cannot be ignored. Here, by using an exceptionally rare adjective, Dioscorus points emphatically to this source. It would therefore be worthwhile to look at two instances of the adjective:

Psalter 10.7-8: νηῷ παμβασιλεύς πολυκυδήεντι ἀνάσσων, οὐρανὸν ἀστερόεντα λαχὼν ὑψαύχενα θῶκον.

The King of all, who is the Master, is in his glorious temple, possessing sparkling heaven, which is his high throne.

(cf. Ps. 10/11:4)

Psalter 63.20-22 καὶ πολυκυδήεντα θεοῦ διαπέφραδεν ἔργα τέχνας ἀθανάτης παλάµης πραπίδεσσι δοκεύων. τερπέσθω βασιλῆος ἐπ’ ἐλπωρῆσι δίκαιος.

And he told plainly the glorious works of God, Pondering in his mind the craftsmanship of the immortal hand.

Let the just man delight, awaiting the King.

(cf. Ps. 63/64:9-10)

These and the other passages in the Homeric Psalter that use the rare adjective πολυκυδήεις emphasize God as King, and support Dioscorus’s own focus on God as King in verse 8. The correspondences are not coincidental.
φιλόχριστον βασιλῆα: Stylistically, Dioscorus underlines the word φιλόχριστον in three ways. First, it is prepared by φ[ι][λ][υ] άνθο[ς] in verse 6. Second, it comes after the main caesura of the verse, which is again feminine: έν τὰ || φιλοχρίστον. And third, the three spondees of the whole phrase make it metrically heavy.

This is a common phrase among Christian writers, who use it to describe the emperor; see: Gerontius, Vita S. Melaniae Junioris, Chapter 2, section 50, line 7 (τῷ φιλοχρίστῳ ἦμων βασιλεῖ Οὐαλεντινανῷ); Gelasius Cyzicenus, Historia Ecclesiastica, Book 3, chapter 10, section 20, line 1 (ὁ εὐσεβῆς καὶ φιλόχριστος βασιλεὺς Κωνσταντῖνος); Anatolius, Epistula ad Leonem papam, part 2, 4, page xxxxxv, line 45 (ὁ εὐσεβέστατος καὶ φιλόχριστος ἦμων βασιλεὺς Θεοδόσιος); Cyrillus Alexandrinus, Contra Julianum, Prologue, section 1, line 18 (ὁ φιλόχριστος βασιλεὺς Θεοδόσιε); Gregorius Nazianzenus, Contra Julianum imperatorem 1 (orat. 4), vol. 35, page 560, line 44 (ὁ θειότατε βασιλέως καὶ φιλοχριστότατε); etc. Dioscorus uses the phrase also in his legal documents. In the draft of a petition written to the Duke of the Thebaid between 567-570, he begins: χριστός πρόνοια καὶ φιλόχριστος ἦμων βασιλεὺς (P.Cair.Masp. I 67009.1; cf. the restoration at P.Lond. V 1674.1) In fact, φιλόχριστος became synonymous with “Christian” and was used to describe people, cities, and ideals. (See Lampe, s.v.) Thus the phrase sits comfortably on the surface level of meaning in Poem 17.

On the allegorical level, the phrase “the King that loves Christ” suggests the relationship between God and Christ, and recalls the scene of Christ’s baptism:

Clement A. Kuehn
And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water, and lo, the heavens were opened unto him. And he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and lighting upon him. And lo, a voice from heaven, saying: “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.” (Mt. 3:16-17; cf. Mc. 1:10-11)

The same kind of scene is presented later in the same Gospel, at the Transfiguration on Mt. Tabor. This time it includes a statement calling attention to Christ’s spoken word (cf. ε[ύε]π[ί]ῆς γ[λα]γ[ό]ς ἀνθ[ο][c]):

While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them; and behold, a voice out of the cloud, which said: “This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.” (Mt. 17:5; cf. Mc. 9:7; Lc. 9:34-35)

Dioscorus has found a phrase that supports the encomiastic surface level, and at the same time advances the allegorical level of meaning. The Son is no longer a beloved flower, but is specifically Christ, and the one who loves him is God.

Clement A. Kuehn
Verse 9

[οἷον δῶρο]ν ἐπήρατον ὃν Θεὸς ὤπασε κόσμῳ!

such a lovely gift that God gave to the world!

Dioscorus placed ὃν Θεὸς at the very center of his verse because it is the culmination of verses 7-9 and also the apex of verse 9 on the allegorical level of meaning. Verse 7 was devoted to the Son, verse 8 was devoted to the Father, and verse 9 brings the two together literally. The relative pronoun ὃν refers back to the νέον νῖα in verse 7. God had sent his beloved Son far away from heaven, and so the antecedent νέον νῖα is far away. Relaying the same separation, the two terms δῶρο]ν and κόσμῳ are at the far extremities of verse 9: the gift was sent far away to earth. But now they are joined again at the center: ὃν Θεὸς. The motion in this verse is brought out by the brevity of the seven short words, in contrast to the three long words in verse 8. And the dense assonance of omicrons and omegas joins the whole verse together into an exclamatory “Oh!” Dioscorus was a master of euphony and word placement.

[οἶον δῶρο]ν: Maspero proposed the restoration [οἷον δῶρο]ν, which finds support in Nonnus, who often uses the pair δῶρον … ὀπάζω (Dionysiaca 5.129, 7.62, 19.93, 47.103, etc.) Maspero might have meant οἶον rather than οἷον; the former is found in the transcriptions by Heitsch and MacCoull. Fournet leaves the area blank: [...] δῶρο]ν. If the former restoration is accepted, then the translation would be: “God gave to the world only this lovely gift.” On the allegorical level, the parallel would be: οὕτως γὰρ ἠγάπησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν

Clement A. Kuehn
κόσμον, ὡστε τὸν υἱὸν τὸν μονογενὴν ἐδωκεν. “For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son.” (Jo. 3:16).

ἐπήρατον: This epic adjective is related to the verb ἔραμαι and means literally “causing love” or “creating delight”. It was used by Homer as an adjective only for things and places: modifying “feast” (δαιτὸς ἐπηράτου II. 9.28), a “grotto” of the nymths (ἄντρον ἐπηράτου Od. 13.103), etc. Nonnus used it to describe the lips of a nymph (χεῖλος ἐπηράτου Dionysiaca 48.647), the tears of a girl (ἐπηράτα δάκρυα Dionysiaca 48.235), etc. Here on the allegorical level, the gift of his Son gave delight both to God and to the world.

ὤπαϲε: Dioscorus chose the right verb to express the giving of this gift. He did not say that God “gave a gift to the world,” but literally that he “gave the gift as a companion to the world” or “gave the gift to lead the world”. Compare the similar nuance found in these Homeric uses: ἔπειρά οἱ ὀπάσα πομπὸν (Il. 13.416); σοὶ γὰρ με πατὴρ ἠμα πομπὸν ὀπάσσεν (Il. 24.461; cf. Od. 9.90); ἀμήγεμόν ἐσθλὸν ὀπάσσον (Od. 15.310); ἀρχὸν δὲ μετ’ ἀμφιτέροισιν ὀπάσσα (Od. 10.204); and πολύν δὲ μοι ὀπάσε λαόν, i.e. “made me leader over many” (Il. 9.483). The restored exclamatory adjective οἷον with ὀπάϲε can be compared to ὦ Ζεῦ, γυναικῶν οἶον ὀπάςας γένος! “O Zeus, what a race of women you have given!” (Aeschylus, Septem contra Thebas 256).

More significant for this study is the use of the verb ὀπάζω by Nonnus. Nonnus used the exact same clause that Dioscorus repeats here. Such an unmistakable borrowing builds a bridge to the entire passage in Nonnus:

Clement A. Kuehn
οὐ γὰρ ἐδόν λόγον ὑὰ πατὴρ θεὸς ὤπασε κόσμῳ, κόσμῳ ἵνα κρίνει προώριον, ἀλλὰ πεσοῦσαν ἀνδρομένην ἵνα πᾶσαν ἀναστήσειε γενέθλην.

For God the Father gave his Son the Word to the world not so that he might condemn the world to death, but so that he might raise up the entire falling race of man.

(Paraphrasis 3.87-89)

Nonnus used the exact same clause later in the Paraphrase, but this time to refer to Scripture, which God gave to guide the world (γράμμασιν ... τάπερ θεὸς ὤπασε κόσμῳ 5.180).

A similar clause appears in the Vision of Dorotheus. This papyrus (P.Bodm. XXIX) was discovered in the library of one of the original Christian monasteries, that at Pbow, south of Panopolis. The Vision was probably written before the Paraphrase by Nonnus and is considered the earliest Christian hexameter poem. Its opening two verses read: ... ἀπὸ ὑφονόθ[εν θεός ἁγνὸς / Χρηστὸν, ἄγαλμα ἐδίο, δίον φάος ὤπος ἁκόσμῳμο “... Holy God from heaven / gave Christ, his delight, a divine light, to the world.”

Thus in verse 9, Dioscorus uses a carefully chosen epic vocabulary to give just the right nuance to his surface level: God gave the emperor as a gift to the people to lead them. At the same time, Dioscorus ties together the allegorical meaning of the last three verses by a strong reference to a popular author, Nonnus, and perhaps to a visionary poem familiar to his monastic audience.

Clement A. Kuehn
Verse 10

[ἡλυθεν] οὐ κατὰ κόσμον ἀληθέα πάντα νομεύει(ν).

Not according to the world's ways he came to shepherd all true things.

[ἡλυθεν] : the restoration of the lacuna is by Maspero, based on Poem 20.23 (Heitsch 2.23; MacCoull p. 135.23): ἄστεα κουρίζων διελήλυθες οὐ κατὰ κόσμου. Maspero also suggests [ασπετον] used adverbially as a possibility, based on Poem 32.30 (Heitsch 21.26; MacCoull p. 89.26): ἄσπετον οὐ κατὰ κόσμου οὗ.

οὐ κατὰ κόσμον: Dioscorus uses this phrase in three other surviving poems—Poem 20.23, 26.8, and 32.30—and it is restored at 30.2. Maspero suggests, however, that it be accented as a relative pronoun οὐ κατὰ κόσμον, and he translates the phrase: “according to the order established by him (by God).” Heitsch, MacCoull, and Fournet accent the initial word as a negative particle: οὐ.

This phrase is perplexing and thus would arrest the audience’s attention. Homer uses the phrase often, with the meaning “in a disorderly fashion”. For example, Homer writes: μάς, ἀτὰρ οὐ κατὰ κόσμον, ἐριζέμεναι βασιλεῦσιν “rashly, improperly, to struggle against kings” (Il. 2.214). And: ὀσσάτιον τε καὶ οἶοιν ἀπώλεσε λαὸν Ἀχαιῶν / μᾶς ἀτὰρ οὐ κατὰ κόσμον ἐμοί δ ἄχος “and he has destroyed so great a people as the Achaeans, recklessly and not in a

Clement A. Kuehn
seemly way, but to my anguish” (Il. 5.758-759). And in a contrast Homer writes: ‘Ἡνίχῳ μὲν ἔπειτα ἑὼ ἐπέτελλεν ἕκαστος / ἵππους εὐ κατὰ κόσμον ἐρυκέμεν αὐθ’ ἔπι τάφρῳ. “Then each gave a command to his own charioteer to restrain the horses in an orderly fashion at the trench.” (Il. 12.84-85)

In Classical literature, the phrase meant “not according to custom” (Plato, Leges 804b; Thucydides 5.63); “not duly” (Isocrates 2.6); or “unreasonably” or “absurdly” (Plato Cratylus 421d). And in the 5th or 6th century, Hesychius of Alexandria, in his lexicon of unusual Greek words and phrases, included οὐ κατὰ κόσμον and defined it as οὐ κατὰ τρόπον. But these meanings are nonsensical in an encomiastic environment, where abundant praise is expected.

In Christian literature, however, the phrase had an entirely different meaning: “not according to the world” meant “according to the Spirit.” Phrased differently, κατὰ κόσμον meant “according to the ways of the world,” which implied “not according to the ways of heaven.” For example, Clement of Alexandria wrote in the Paedagogus:

πίστις δὲ οὐ σοφῶν τῶν κατὰ κόσμον, ἀλλὰ τῶν κατὰ θεόν ἐστιν τὸ κτῆμα· ἢ δὲ καὶ ἄνευ γραμμάτων ἔκπαιδεύεται, καὶ τὸ σύγγραμμα αὐτῆς τὸ ἰδιωτικὸν ἀμα καὶ θείον ἀγάπη κέκληται, σύνταγμα πνευματικόν.

Faith is the possession not of those that are wise according to the world, but of those [who are wise] according to God. And it is taught without books. Indeed its handbook, both unrefined and divine, is called love—a spiritual composition. (Book 3, chapter 11, section 78)

Clement A. Kuehn
In biblical literature, the κόσμος was the temporal, visible world, in contrast to the eternal, spiritual world of heaven: Ἰησοῦς δὲ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα εἰδὼς ὅτι ἦλθεν αὐτοῦ ἡ ὥρα ἵνα μεταβῇ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, ἀγαπήσας τοὺς ἱδίους τοὺς ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, εἰς τέλος ἡγάπησεν αὐτούς. “Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.” (Jo. 13:1)

The κόσμος was the kingdom of evil: νῦν κρίσις ἐστὶν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, νῦν ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου ἐκβληθήσεται ἐξω· κἀγὼ ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ ἐκ τῆς γῆς, πάντας ἠλκύσω πρὸς ἐμαυτόν. “Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.” (Jo. 12:31-32)

The biblical and Christian meanings above do not create any more harmony on the surface level than the Homeric or Classical meaning. Dioscorus cannot say that the new emperor will govern according to spiritual laws, and not the laws of the earth. In biblical literature, the κόσμος included the laws of nature and the laws of religion, from whose bondage Christ freed his believers (cf. Gal. 4:1-7). Some assistance, however, is offered by Athanasius of Alexandria, who offers a specific nuance to the word κόσμος:

ὁ οὖν θάνατός ἐστιν ὁ κόσμος, ἡ δὲ ζωή ἐστιν ἡ δικαιοσύνη. μακρὰν ὁ θάνατος ἀπὸ τῆς δικαιοσύνης, καθ’ ὅσον ὁ θάνατος ἀπὸ τῆς ζωῆς· ἐὰν οὖν πορεύῃ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ πορεύῃ καὶ ἑκτὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ γίνῃ κατὰ τὴν θείαν γραφήν. ἐὰν τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ πορεύῃ, ἐν
The world is death; righteousness is life. As far away as death is from life, so the world is from righteousness. If therefore you live in the world, you live in death and are apart from God (according to divine Scripture). If you live in righteousness, you have crossed over into life, and death will not touch you. For death is not present to the righteous, but a change: for he is changed from this world to the eternal rest. (De virginitate [Sp.], section 18, line 21)

Athanasius does not use the phrase οὐ κατὰ κόσμον, but he does appear to equate righteousness with οὐ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. Thus on the surface level, if we look ahead to the infinitive νομεύει(ν) at the end of the verse, rather than the main verb ἠλύθεν at the beginning, Dioscorus might be encouraging the emperor “to govern in righteousness.” But now perhaps we are getting too far from the actual phrase that Dioscorus chose: οὐ κατὰ κόσμον.

Up to this point Dioscorus has been using an epic vocabulary to support the surface level, which is to praise the visiting image of the new emperor. Here, he rejects the Homeric meaning of the phrase and adopts an exclusively Christian meaning. Is this evidence of a mishmash of Hellenistic and Christian sensibilities? Hardly. More likely, it is a clear shift to the deeper level of meaning. Dioscorus crafted the beginning of this poem to reach a climax at verse 10. While Dioscorus had painstakingly concealed the allegorical level in the earlier verses, beginning already at verse 8 he started to reveal the deeper level of meaning. As the word φιλόχριστον, so the phrase οὐ κατὰ κόσμον has no place in the Homeric language of the poem and no place in the secular rhetorical design of the encomium. At this point, Dioscorus allows the allegorical level not only to be revealed but also to gain ascendency. Yes, the emperor in the 6th century was Christian, but Dioscorus chose in Poem 17 not to use a biblical or Christian vocabulary to praise him. When the poet breaks his own rules, it is for a reason.

Clement A. Kuehn

And it is at the allegorical level of meaning that Dioscorus begins the next nine verses (11-19), which focus on St. Theodosius: “With divinely inspired counsels [God] nurtured the wise and illustrious spirit of Theodosius.” No longer the deeper level of meaning, the spiritual becomes the primary level of meaning, supported by the Homeric and rhetorical elements.

νομεύειν: It is interesting that Dioscorus abbreviates the infinitive: he put a stroke above the final syllable νομευεῖ. Without the stroke, the infinitive could have served as the main verb, and the missing first word of the verse could have been an adverb, as Maspero had suggested.

The verb νομεύω is Homeric and means literally “to put to graze” or “to drive afield”. It is used for a shepherd tending his flock. For example: καλλίτριχα μῆλα νομεύων (Od. 9.336); and ἐνόμευε νομὸν κάτα πίονα μῆλα (Od. 9.217). Nonnus uses this verb in the same way: βόας καὶ μῆλα νομεύων (Dionysiaca 38.70); and figuratively: "Ὑμνοῦ μηλονόμοιο βόας Κυθέρεα νομεύει "Cytherea tends the oxen of the herding hymn" (Dionysiaca 15.286). The related noun is νομεύς, which is a herdsman: κόνες τ’ ἄνδρες τε

Clement A. Kuehn
νομής (II. 17.65). The related adjective means “pastoral”: νομευτικὴν ἐπιστήμην and τὸν νομευτικὸν ἡμῖν πολλῶν φανεισόν ἄρτι τεχνῶν (Plato, Politicus 267b, 267d). These examples indicate that Dioscorus is not talking about an emperor. The word’s connotations are about a shepherd. If Dioscorus had wanted to use the verb figuratively to mean “direct” or “manage”, he would have chosen the variation νομάω, as Nonnus had done (Dionysiaca 7.110). Thus, from the beginning to the end of verse 10, Dioscorus remains at the spiritual level of meaning.

Christ’s ministry was often compared to the work of a shepherd, and his disciples to sheep. Prophetically in the Old Testament: Κύριος ποιμάνει με, καὶ οὐδὲν με ὑστερήσει. “The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.” (Ps. 22/23:1) And: ὡς ποιμὴν ποιμανεῖ τὸ ποίμνιον αὐτοῦ καὶ τῷ βραχίονι αὐτοῦ συνάξει ἄρνας καὶ ἐν γαστρὶ ἑχούσας παρακαλέσει. “He shall tend his flock like a shepherd. And he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and shall gently lead those that are with young.” (Is. 40:11) Then in the Gospels: Ἐγὼ εἰμί ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλὸς καὶ γινώσκω τὰ καὶ γινώσκουσιν με τὰ ἐμὰ. “I am the good shepherd and know my sheep and am known of mine.” (Jo. 10:14) And also in the Epistles: καὶ φανερωθέντος τοῦ ἀρχιποίμου κομματίσθη τὸν ἀμαράντινον τῆς δόξης στέφανον. “And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.” (I Pet. 5:4)

*[ἤλυθεν] : If the restoration is correct, Dioscorus creates a ring structure that connects the final verse of this section with the first two verses of the poem: ἵκανε … ἵκανεν … ἤλυθεν “he has come … he has come … he came.”
Figures 15-16. Antinoöpolis. It is possible that Dioscorus wrote Poem 17 while living in Antinoöpolis and doing legal work there.
Figures 17-18. Antinoöpolis. About 135 km. northeast of Aphrodito, it was the capital city of the Thebaid in Upper Egypt and the residence of the Duke.
Figures 19-20 (following page). Antinoöpolis. The ancient site lies beneath the modern village of Sheikh Abada and continues into the desert of Wadi Abada. Monks lived in the caves of the cliffs; several monasteries were built nearby.
COMMENTARY TO POEM 17 RECTO

Verses 11-19: Theodosius

Verses 11-12

[kleivót] aton δ’ ἀτίταλλε θ[еοφ]ραδέεσσιν βουλαίς
[εόφρον]ος εὐσεβίς Θεοδοσίου πάνσοφον ἀσθμα,
With divinely inspired counsels he nurtured the wise and illustrious spirit of Theodosius, of clear-thinking piety,

The third part of Poem 17 recto focuses on Theodosius. It starts dramatically with a spondaic line, which is rare in the poetry of Dioscorus. The final two feet of verse 11 are ἐσιν βουλαῖς instead of the required | | | . This change in the rhythm of the poem stresses the beginning of a triad of adjectives involving the mind. The first adjective θεοφραδής means in an active sense “speaking from God” or “prophetic” (Orpheus, Fragmenta 271), and in a passive sense “indicated by God” (Proclus, Hymni 6.8). It is related to the poetic noun φραδή, which means “understanding” or “knowledge” (τῶν δὲ μελλόντων τετύφλωνται φραδαί Pindarus, Olympia 12.9). The compound adjective θεοφραδής suggests an understanding of God. The second adjective in the triad, σώφρων, is a restoration by Maspero and means “of sound mind”. And the third adjective, πάνσοφος, means “very clever”. It is difficult to assess how these adjectives apply to St. Theodosius. Only a few fragments of his literary output have survived. Yet

Clement A. Kuehn
his entry in the History of the Patriarchs of the Coptic Church of Alexandria begins in this fashion:

> By the command of God, the bishops and orthodox people assembled after the death of Timothy, and, by the dispensation of the Lord Christ, they ordained the holy Father Theodosius patriarch. He was a virgin, and a master of the literary style used in ecclesiastical writings. (PO 4 [=1.4], pp. 455-456; translation by B. Evetts)

Although written in Arabic, it seems that from the 6th century onwards the History was derived from eyewitness Coptic accounts.

It is clear that Theodosius is the honoree of this part of the poem and of the entire hymn. The name Theodosius in verse 12 is in a strong position. It comes after the main caesura of the verse (which is masculine) and is emphasized by the paronomasia (word play) in the following verse: Θεοδοσίου ... Θεοῦ δέος. Θεοδόσιος is an adjectival substantive that means “given by God”; Θεοῦ δέος means a “fear of God”. Most importantly, the name Theodosius is at the apex of a tricolon crescens (ascending) and tricolon diminuens (descending) of syllable length: three four five (= Θεοδόσιος) three two. The discussion of his spirit (see πάνσοφον ἄθμα below) is highlighted by the onomatopoeic assonance of omicrons and omega. It is also noteworthy that there is no verb, participle, or

Clement A. Kuehn
Theodosius, his piety, and his spirit, held tightly together in one large clause, are thus presented as an unchanging unity.

The name Theodosius is the first proper name (besides Θεός) that appears in the poem as it has survived. The name Justin (suggested by some editors for verses one and two) is a reconstruction based upon circumstantial evidence.

[kλεινότ]ατον: is a reconstruction by the original editor Maspero. If the restoration is correct, the adjective modifies the direct object at the end of the following verse: ἀθεμα. This hyperbaton ties verses 11 and 12 together as a couplet, as does the triad of mind adjectives.

The superlative adjective κλεινότατος (“very famous”) does not appear elsewhere in the poetry of Dioscorus, Homer, or Nonnus. It does appear in Classical poetry, especially the comedies of Aristophanes. In the comedy Peace, Aristophanes has the chorus sing: εἰ δ’ ὁ δὲν εἰκός τινα τιμήσαι, θύγατερ Διός, οἵτις ἄριστος / κομιδοδιδάσκαλος ἀνθρώπων καὶ κλεινότατος γεγένηται, / ἀξίος εἶναι φησ’ εὐλογίας μεγάλης ὁ διδάσκαλος ἡμῶν. “If ever it were proper, daughter of Zeus, to honor some man who has become the best / and the most famous teacher of choruses, / then our teacher is worthy of this great blessing.” (Pax 736-738) And calling upon the inhabitants of the heavenly city of the Birds, Aristophanes writes: ὦ κλεινότατην αἰθέριον οἰκίσας πόλιν “O you dwelling in the most famous ethereal city” (Aves 1277). Suda, who wrote a Greek lexicon in the tenth century, also notes Aristophanes’s use of of this word (Lexicon, καππα, entry 573, line 3). Dioscorus, judging from his surviving library and his imitations, had a predilection for Athenian Comedy, both Old and New. The superlative adjective κλεινότατος is also frequent in Proclus (Theologia Platonica, vol. 4, page 21, line 13; page 28, line 8; etc.).

ἀτίταλλε : is the reduplicated form of ἀτάλλω, which means literally “to rear” or “to tend”. Maspero notes that this is the imperfect tense and that the subject is the πάνσοφον ἄσθμα of verse 12. If so, then it must be understood as intransitive. This is not the usual way that this verb is used. Dioscorus uses it in a transitive sense (with a direct object) in the only other clear instance in his poetic corpus: ἀκτεάνοϲ ἀτίταλλε τὸ εἴον μένοϲ. “Your power nourished the poor.” (Poem 14.37; Heitsch 13.13; MacCoull p. 96.13; cf. Poem 28.7) Homer uses the verb exclusively with direct objects, to describe the care given to horses, hogs, etc. (Il. 5.271; Od. 14.41; etc.). It is also used by Homer for rearing up children (Il. 24.60, etc.). Nonnus uses it exclusively as a transitive verb (Dionysiaca 3.379, 16.103, 39.33). I would hesitate therefore to understand it here intransitively. It makes more sense when Christ, the subject of the previous verse, continues as the subject here: Christ nourished the spirit of Theodosius.

θ[εοφ]ρασέεϲϲιν : The restoration is by Maspero. As mentioned above, the word creates a spondaic verse, which is striking. Dioscorus wrote an alternative in the right hand margin: θεορρήτοϲιϲ, which would also form a spondaic verse. He was intent, one way or another, on emphasizing this word. The marginal alternate emphasizes speaking: θεορρήτοϲ[ϲ] … [ϲ]επιστάων “with words … spoken from the god [the Muse]” (Poem 11.27; Heitsch 3.27; Mac-Coull p. 137.27). The original word in the papyrus θεοφραδήϲ emphasizes the mind—which Neoplatonic and Christian philosophers would designate with the noun νοῦς. There are other differences between the two word choices. θεόρρητος is more passive: inspired, in the sense of “uttered by God.” θεοφραδής is more active: inspired, and thus “speaking from God.”

Clement A. Kuehn

Both words are used by Nonnus, but both are uncommon. The alternate θεόρρητος is rare: I find only fifteen occurrences in Greek literature to the end of the Byzantine Era, and only Methodius, Nonnus, and the Theosophorum Graecorum Fragmenta used it before Dioscorus. The original θεοφραδής, which Dioscorus never marked and thus never rejected, was used by Philo, Proclus, Nonnus, and Christodorus before Dioscorus. Hesychius, writing during the reign of Justinian, defined the noun form as “with the opinions, words, thoughts of God” θεοφραδίαις θεοῦ γνώµαις, λόγοις, φράσεσι (Lexicon, theta, entry 323; line 1; cf. entry 322). Nonnus uses θεοφραδής only in his Paraphrase, and the five occurrences there are informative. He employs the word when describing Christ as a teacher (3.9), when describing his teachings (3.38, 8.154, 12.177), and when describing his disciples after his death (20.113).

Here one might suggest, based on the connotations of the word and the usage and influence of Nonnus, that the original θ[εοφραδής] ἦς “divinely inspired counsels” are Theodosius’s own writings to the faithful. Theodosius’s spirit (see the discussion of ἄσθμα below) was nourished by writings that were speaking from God. This is an important, if overly-semantic interpretation. Although Dioscorus might be suggesting that Scriptures, as spoken from God, were a source of spiritual nourishment, Dioscorus is actually saying that Theodosius’s spirit was nourished by his own inspired writing.

Clement A. Kuehn
πάνσοφον ἁσθμα : means literally “the all-knowing breath” or “the very wise breath”. In Homer, the word ἁσθμα means “hard breathing” or “panting” (Il. 15.10, 241, etc.). In early Byzantine literature, including Nonnus, it is used simply for “breathing” or “breath” (Agathias, AP 9.677; Colluthus 179; Dionysiaca 1.2).

The term ἁσθμα is used only once in biblical literature, in the Hellenistic apocryphal book The Wisdom of Solomon (11:18). The biblical term for ἁσθμα is πνεῦμα. In biblical and Christian literature, πνεῦμα has a variety of meanings. It is used for “breath”: ἀλλ᾿ ἐφ᾿ ἡμῶν μὲν τὸ πνεῦμα ἢ τοῦ ἀέρος ἔστιν ὀλκή, ἀλλοτρίου πράγματος πρὸς τὴν τοῦ σώματος σύστασιν ἀναγκαίως εἰσελκομένου τε καὶ προχεομένου. “But for us, the πνεῦμα is the drawing of air, which is a foreign thing to the constitution of the body, necessarily drawn in and poured forth.” (Gregorius Nyssenus, Oratio catechetica magna, section 2, lines 5-7). And πνεῦμα is used for the breath of life (Gen. 6:17, 7:15), the Holy Spirit (Mc. 3:29, etc.), and the individual’s spirit (I Thess. 5:23, cf. Rom. 8:2; I Cor. 5:3).

Adhering to his word strategy, Dioscorus here employs the Homeric ἁσθμα in place of the Christian πνεῦμα in the sense of the individual’s “spirit” or “soul”. This interpretation is supported by the modifying adjective πάνσοφον, literally “all-wise spirit” or “very wise spirit”. This adjective might be proleptic: Theodosius’s spirit does not become wise until after Christ has nourished it with inspiration. For a parallel biblical passage, see: ἀλλὰ πνεῦμα ἐστὶν ἐν βροτοῖς, πνοὴ δὲ παντοκράτορός ἐστιν ἡ διδάσκουσα.

Clement A. Kuehn
“But there is a spirit in men: and the breath of the Almighty giveth them understanding” (Job 32:8).

Verses 13-14

who pursued since birth a fear of God and his laws,
who knows how to bear the purple robe of the Christ-bearing saints.

Having explained Theodosius’s source of inspiration, Dioscorus now describes his lifestyle and ultimate reward. In verse 14, ἡδέ γε Θεκῳδος ἡδέ γε Θεκῳδος, [θείω]ν χριστοφόρων ἀλουργίδα οἴδε φορῆναι. occupies the first half before the caesura, and ὁς ἀλουργίδα οἴδε φορῆναι occupies the second half. This creates a balance between the saints on one hand, and Theodosius on the other, who now joins them in this verse. The polyptoton, -φόρων ... φορῆναι, emphatically ties the two halves together. The verse is further unified by the notable assonance. In contrast to verse 13 with its many epsilons (and accented epsilons), Verse 14’s omicron and omega sounds support its motif of persecution and suffering.

If the restoration [θείω]ν is correct, it recalls Θεοῦ of verse 13, Θεοδοσίου of verse 12, and θ[εφ]ραδέεςιν of verse 11, tying these four verses together into a quatrain. The general movement of the four verses is simple: (a) Theodosius was divinely inspired; (b) Theodosius, his piety, and his spirit were as one; (c) his activities were devoted to God; and finally (d) he joined the saints in heaven.
The restoration is by Maspero and is based on Poem 6.6 (MacCoull, p. 123, verse 4). If correct, it is recalling a standard biblical concept:

By thee have I been holden up from the womb: thou art he that took me out of my mother’s bowels: my hymn shall be continually of thee. (Ps. 70/71:6)

But thou art he that took me out of the womb: thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother’s breasts. I was cast upon thee from the womb: thou art my God from my mother’s belly. (Ps. 21:10-11 / 22:9-10)

There is a grammatical problem with this participle, which gives it extra emphasis. The participle should be neuter in gender, to agree with ἂσθμα, but it is masculine. It is as if the spirit of Theodosius (Θεοδοσίου … ἄσθμα) were Theodosius himself. The Patriarch’s actions, Dioscorus implies, were controlled by his spirit.
There is also a typo by Dioscorus, which is inconsequential. He changed, in the line, the original ἠδὲ καὶ to an ἠδὲ γε to solve a metrical problem: — — — in the sixth foot. What he meant was ἠδὲ τε, which was the standard conjunction and which he used in his other poems. He was perhaps thinking momentarily of the similar Homeric article ἠδὲ γε as in ἠδὲ γε βουλή (Od. 2.372).

The word μεθέπω is used frequently by Dioscorus in his poetry: see Poems 32.2, 17; 34.7; 35.4 (Heitsch 21.2, 14; 23.7; and 24.4). It was used by Homer and often by Nonnus. It means “to follow after”, “carry”, or “cherish”. Here, a zeugma is created. The participle must mean “carrying” when applied to a fear of God (cf. Pindar, Nemea 6.13). But it must mean “following after” in the sense of “keeping” when applied to the laws of God.

I can find no good witness in Greek literature where μεθέπω is used to express “keep the law.” Thus the solution above is not entirely satisfactory. Psalm 18 (LXX), however, uses a metaphor that might help. In this Psalm, David speaks about the fear of God and compares God’s laws to gold that is much desired.

ο νόμος τοῦ κυρίου ἁμωμος, ἑπιστρέφων ψυχάς· ἡ μαρτυρία κυρίου πιστή, σοφίζουσα νήπια· τὰ δικαιώματα κυρίου εὐθεία, εὐφραίνοντα καρδίαν· ἡ ἐντολὴ κυρίου τηλαυγής, φωτίζουσα ὀφθαλμούς· ὁ φόβος κυρίου ἁγνός, διαμένων εἰς αἰώνα αἰώνος·
tὰ κρίματα κυρίου ἀληθινά, δεδικαιωμένα ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό,

Clement A. Kuehn
The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul;
the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple;
The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart;
the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes;
The fear of the Lord is pure, enduring for ever;
the judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether, more to be desired are they than gold and a very precious jewel, sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
And thy servant keeps them. (Ps. 18:8-12 / 19:7-11)

The parallels between this Psalm and Dioscorus’s verse 13 are unmistakable. There is the fear of the Lord (ὁ φόβος κυρίου) and the laws (ὁ νόμος τοῦ κυρίου, τὰ δικαίωματα κυρίου, ἡ ἐντολὴ κυρίου, τὰ κρίματα κυρίου). There is a desire for the laws (ἐπιθυµητὰ), and the devout keeps them (ὁ δοῦλός σου φυλάσσει αὐτά). There are no verbal correspondences between the poem by Dioscorus and the Psalm by David, but Dioscorus normally avoids biblical vocabulary. We can safely assume, however, that his devout audience would have been familiar with the concepts and the imagery in this Psalm. If Dioscorus was drawing from Psalm 18’s metaphor of treasure, there is still a zeugma in his use of μεθέπω: Theodosius was “carrying” a fear of God, but was “cherishing” his Laws like treasure. Yet now both meanings of μεθέπω are supported by other authors. To strengthen the parallel, the second half of verse 12 of Psalm 18 says that there is a reward for keeping the Laws of

Clement A. Kuehn
God: ἐν τῷ φυλάσσειν αὐτὰ ἀνταπόδοσις πολλή. “In the keeping of them there is great reward.” Verse 14 of the Dioscorian hymn describes the reward that Theodosius receives: the purple robe of sainthood.

[θείων χριστοφόρων] : The restoration is by Maspero. Perhaps Dioscorus also corrected himself: it seems that he had originally written χριστοφόρον.

The singular χριστοφόρος and the plural χριστοφόροι are quite common, though never in biblical literature. Χριστοφόρος means literally “Christ-bearing” and could be used for any Christian in general and even as a courtesy title (P.Lond. 1926.1). The term is used especially for one that is filled with or inspired by Christ: such as martyrs (Gregorius Nyssenus, Encomium in sanctum Stephanum protomartyrem ii, vol. 46, page 721, line 17; page 724, line 51; etc.), virgins (Athanasius, Vita Antonii, chapter 61, line 4), and the apostles (Athanasius, Contra gentes, section 5, line 23). The last is how the term is used in a document by Dioscorus: ὁρός τῶν χριστοφόρων ἀποστόλων “the Monastery of the Christ-Bearing Apostles” (P.Cair.Masp. I 67003.5). The term is also used in Christian literature for the emperor Constantine (Vita Pachomii Σ 76, p. 251, line 22).

The phrase θείος χριστοφόρος or θεῖοι χριστοφόροι does not appear elsewhere in the surviving poetry of Dioscorus, nor in Greek literature prior to Dioscorus. After Dioscorus, in the 10th century, we find θείος Χριστοφόρος “Saint Christophor”, but that is something else (Orestes, Vita et conversatio Christophori et Macarii, section 13, line 49; section 17, line 12). θείος, however, is a common word, from Homer on. The adjective means “divine” and is usually applied to gods, heroes, and emperors. In Christian literature, it is applied to God and to anyone or anything that shares in his divinity, including saints. The term is even applied to the emperor Constantine (Agathangelus, Historia Armeniae [versio Graeca], chapter 166, line 1).

Clement A. Kuehn

Dioscorus in his poetry uses the term \( \text{θεῖος} \) in ways similar to the above. He uses it as a substantive to refer to God, as when he repeats Christ’s preeminent law:

\[ \phiιλ\epsilonις \tau\delta \thetaειον \kappa[\alphaι] \phiιλ[\epsilonις] \tauο\upsilonς \piλησίους \text{ “You love God and you love your neighbors”} \text{ (Heitsch 10.14; 17.13; cf. 17.11).} \]

And he uses it apparently to refer to the Son of God (though other editors differ), where the biblical vocabulary is replaced by Homeric:

\[ \phiιλ\epsilonις \tau\delta \text{ “You love God and you love your neighbors”} \text{ (Heitsch 10.14; 17.13; cf. 17.11).} \]

Compare to Dioscorus here the common biblical phraseology for Christ:

\[ \betaασιλευς \betaασιλεων \kappaαλ κ\upsilon τ\upsilonς \kappaυρ\upsilonος “\text{“King of Kings, and Lord of Lords”} \text{ (Apoc. 19:16; etc.).} \]

If Maspero’s restoration of verse 14 is correct, then \[ \text{θείων χριστοφόρων} \text{ is emphasizing the saints, who are the “divine Christians”.} \]

Perhaps, even more specifically, the apostles. The Patriarch of \[ \text{Clement A. Kuehn} \]

Alexandria was considered a direct descendent of the apostle Mark.

ὁς ἁλουργίδα οἶδε φορῆναι: “who knows how to bear the purple robe.” If Theodosius, now in heaven, knows how to wear the regal robe of sainthood, then Dioscorus is implying that he had some practice: he was living like a saint while still on earth. This usually involves not only an ascetic lifestyle, but also suffering.

The ἁλουργίς is a “purple robe”. It does not appear in Homer or Nonnus, but it is common in Greek literature, especially for the garment worn by the wealthy and the emperors. In Christian literature, it is used metaphorically for St. Paul’s blindness, which is called the ἁλουργίς Θεοῦ (Isidorus Pelusiota, Epistulæ I 346). The word is also used metaphorically for the humanity of Christ, which he had to bear to complete his mission: τὴν ἁλουργίδα τοῦ σώματος (Joannes Damascenus, Orationes de imaginibus tres, section 1,4, lines 63-64). With these comparisons in mind, one needs to recall that Christ once wore a purple robe: during his Passion, when it was used to mock him. The biblical vocabulary, which Dioscorus usually avoids, is τὸ πορφυροῦν ἱμάτιον. See:

καὶ οἱ στρατιώται πλέξαντες στέφανον ἔξ ἀκανθῶν ἐπέθηκαν αὐτῷ τῇ κεφαλῇ, καὶ ιμάτιον πορφυροῦν περιέβαλον αὐτὸν, καὶ ἔλεγον, Χαίρε, ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων· καὶ ἐδίδοσαν αὐτῷ ῥαπίσματα. Καὶ ἐξῆλθεν πάλιν ἔξω ὁ Πιλάτος καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς, ‘Ἰδε ἄγω ὑμῖν αὐτὸν ἔξω, ἵνα γνώτε ὅτι οὐδεμίαν αἰτίαν εὑρίσκω ἐν αὐτῷ. ἐξῆλθεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἔξω, φορῶν τὸν ἀκάνθινον στέφανον καὶ

Clement A. Kuehn
And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on him a purple robe, and said: “Hail, King of the Jews!” And they smote him with their hands. Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them: “Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him.” Then came Jesus forth, bearing the crown of thorns and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them: “Behold the man!” (Jo. 19:2-5)

One might note the verbal correspondence here: like Theodosius that bears the purple robe (φορήναι), Christ is bearing (φορῶν) the purple robe. But φορέω is common in the context of clothing.

Verses 15-16

[Hurry now, commander, and call your inhabitants. You were unique: receive the illustrious gifts.

The restoration [σπεύδεο] is by Maspero. He notes that the poet is now addressing the Duke of the Thebaid, the στρατίαρχος, and wants him to assemble the citizens of the province to assist in the festival. Maspero’s interpretation works well for the surface level of meaning.

Note in verse 15 the strong alliteration of sigmas, and the way in which

Clement A. Kuehn
Dioscorus mirrors their use in the consonance of verse 16. A sigma begins verse 15, begins the vocative, and begins the second half of the verse (after the main caesura). Then a sigma ends verse 15, ends the first word of verse 16, ends the first half of verse 16 (after the main caesura), and two sigmas end verse 16. The strategy effectively binds the two verses together.

[Ϲπεύδεο] νῦν, Στρατίαρχε, Σέθεν καλέειν ναετήραϹ.

[....].οϹ ἐπλέο μούνοϹ, ἄγαλτά δώρα κομίϹηϹ.

νυν : becomes an enclitic after imperatives.

Στρατίαρχε : As a vocative title for the honoree, this is obviously an important word. The word στρατίαρχος and its equivalent στρατιάρχης are not found in Homer or Nonnus, and are not found in biblical literature. Yet these words are used frequently in the poetry of Dioscorus: Poems 10.36, 44; 18.26, 31, 42; 20.6, 13, and 28 (Heitsch 2.6, 13, 28; 4a.7, 15; 5.2, 7, and 18). A parallel passage in Dioscorus begins to elucidate the allegorical meaning here: τέρπεό νυν, στρατίαρχε, τεὸς χρόνος οὔποτ’ ὀλεῖται. “Rejoice, commander, your time will never end.” (Poem 10.36; Heitsch 4a.7; MacCoull p. 113.7) Yet to fully understand the meaning, στρατίαρχε requires some exploration.

στρατίαρχος and στρατιάρχης are variant spellings of the words στράταρχος and στρατάρχης. In Classical literature, the latter two were equivalent to στράτηγος and designated the “general of an army”; see Herodotus, Historiae, Book 3, section 157, line 20; Book 8, section 44, line 14; etc. In the 6th century, according to the lexicographer Hesychius, the term στράταρχος was still equivalent to στρατηγός (Lexicon, sigma, entry 1962, line 1). Yet στρατηγός was used in the Byzantine papyrus of Egypt to designate a commander that had both military AND administrative authority. See Preisigke III Ab. 8 and 10, s.v. στρατηγός; cf. στρατηλάτης. The terms στρατίαρχος, στρατιάρχης, στράταρχος, and στρατάρχης are not found in papyrus documents.

Clement A. Kuehn

Στρατηγός was also used metaphorically by Christian writers to designate a commander in the army of Christ the King: ὁ δὲ τοῦ Δεσπότου Χριστοῦ στρατηγός (Theodoretus, Interpretatio in xiv epistulas sancti Pauli, vol. 82, page 552, line 43; etc.). In the 6th century, the hymnwriter Romanus used it even to designate St. Peter as the leader of the Church: Πέτρος δὲ, … ὁ στρατηγός τῆς φαμιλίας σου, ἰδὼν σε ἐξωσμένον, ἐλεγεν ἀδήμονων· Σὺ μου τοὺς πόδας νίπτεις; “But Peter, the commander of your family, seeing you girded, said in anguish: ‘You are washing my feet?’” (Romanus Melodus, Cantica, Hymn 33, section 9, lines 4-6).

Dioscorus used the term στρατίαρχος as an equivalent of στρατηγός to designate Patriarch Theodosius metaphorically as a “commander” of the heavenly saints, both in the military sense and because of his ecclesiastic leadership. That a believer was expected to be a strong soldier of Christ and endure persecution was a common biblical image; see συγκακοπαθησον ὡς καλὸς στρατιώτης Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. “Thou therefore endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.” (II Tim. 2:3) See also: Ταύτην τὴν παραγελίαν παρατίθεμαι σοι, τέκνον Τιμόθεο, κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἔπι σὲ προφητείας,

Clement A. Kuehn
ἵνα στρατεύῃ ἐν αὐταῖς τὴν καλὴν στρατείαν. “This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare.” (I Tim. 1:18). And: τὰ γὰρ ὀπλα τῆς στρατείας ἡμῶν οὐ σαρκικὰ ἀλλὰ δυνατὰ τῷ θεῷ πρὸς καθαίρεσιν ὀχυρωμάτων. “For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds.” (II Cor. 10:4; etc.)

Dioscorus could have used the word στρατηγός metrically, because the alpha is long. I surmise that he did not want to use a biblical word (στρατηγός appears frequently in Scripture) but wanted a word that sounded similar and carried the same connotations. Moreover, there is a distinct rhyme between Thodosious’s title πατριάρχης and Dioscorus’s word choice στρατιάρχης.

Dioscorus had to use the variant spelling στρατίαρχος with a vocative στρατίαρχε because the form στρατιάρχης has a vocative στρατιάρχα with a long alpha, which would not work metrically in dactylic hexameter.

cέθεν καλέειν ναετῆρας: The word ναετήρ (“inhabitant”) was not used by Homer, but was frequently used by Nonnus—more so than by any other writer of Greek literature (43 occurrences in two epics). It is especially common in the Dionysiaca in the phrase ναετήρας Ὁλύμπου or ναετήρες Ὁλύμπου (16 occurrences), where it means “the inhabitants of Olympus” or simply “divinities”. Nonnus also used it in the Paraphrase. At least once it refers to the young Christ, an inhabitant of Nazareth, the Son of God: Ἰησοῦν ὅσιοι βοῶμενον υἱὸν Ἰωσήφ, / Ναζαρέθ ναετήρα, θεοῦ γόνον (Paraphrasis 1.183). Nonnus also used it in the Paraphrase to refer to the immortal inhabitants of heaven: ἀθάνατοι ναετῆρες (Paraphrasis 14.13).

Clement A. Kuehn

Who then were the Dioscorian ναετῆρες? And in what way were they his? With the term στρατῖάρχος Dioscorus recognized that Theodosius held a position of authority in heaven. The hierarchical order was a firmly held concept in Byzantine religious thought; see Ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite, De caelesti hierarchia and De ecclesiastica hierarchia. Over whom did Theodosius have command in heaven? One can imagine that since Theodosius had been Patriarch of Alexandria and had suffered because of his Monophysite views, his inhabitants were, in the broad sense, the faithful that had inhabited Egypt, and in a narrower sense, other Monophysite believers.

[...].οϲ : Maspero suggested the restoration [ἀφθ]τοϲ “imperishable” or “immortal”, which would work well on the deeper level of meaning. The word is Homeric, and was used for imperishable items (I. 2.46, 5.724, etc.) and even a throne: δῶρα δέ τοι δόσω καλὸν θρόνον ἄφθιτον αἰεὶ χρύσεον (Il. 14.238). The verbal parallels between Homer’s verse here and Dioscorus’s poem include not only ἄφθιτον, but also δῶρα (verse 16) and θρόνον (verse 19). The adjective ἄφθιτος was used by other writers to designate a divinity (Hymni Homerici, In Mercurium 326; Hesiodus, Theogonia 389, 397; etc.) Yet since Maspero tagged his restoration with a “?” and there are many possibilities, we leave the lacuna empty.

ἔπλεο μοῦνοϲ : literally “you were alone.” The verb is striking because of its grammatical complexity. It is the 2nd singular, imperfect or second aorist, indicative, middle/passive, uncontracted form of πέλω. If contracted, one would see ἔπλευ. The verb πέλεται had a broad spectrum of meanings in Homer and later. It originally meant “to be hurled”, “to be in motion” or “to be busy about” (see Autenrieth, s.v. πέλει). By derivation it came to mean “to become”, “to be”, and even “to rise”. All of these meanings can be found in Homer. The form ἔπλεο can be imperfect or a second aorist, but Homer did not augment the imperfect. The aorist has present significance: “became” or “is”. Despite its apparent complexity, this verb form is found twice in Homer (Il. 1.418; 22.281), six times in Nonnus, and six times in Dioscorus (Heitsch 2.4, 6.17, 7.17, 21.13, and 24.7).

The adjective μοῦνος could express preeminence, rather than “alone” or “solitary”; see Plato, Symposium 215c, 222a; Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 299; etc. With respect to Theodosius’s biography, one needs to keep in mind the full spectrum of meanings. “You were preeminent”—in as much as he was Patriarch. “You were unique”—in as much as he was the last Patriarch to be embraced both by the Chalcedonians and Non-Chalcedonians of Alexandria. “You were alone”—in as much as he was temporarily imprisoned and became a fugitive. And even more literally, Theodosius was clearly designated a virgin in the History of the Patriarchs. In Christian art and literature the virgins were a preferred group, which received regal honors with the martyrs in heaven (see Figures 7-8 and the discussion of ἀγαλματὰ δῶρα below).

Yet a word is missing, and [...].οϲ ἔπλεο μοῦνοϲ could mean “you alone were …” or “you alone are … .” The phrase ἔπλεο μοῦνοϲ also appears at Poem

Clement A. Kuehn
20.4 (Heitsch 2.4), but it is in poor condition: ἐν χθονὶ παμβασιλῆς .......
ἐπλεο μοῦνος ....... Possibly: “In the land of the king of all, you alone are … .” (Cf. Poem 10.31: πανυπέρτατος ἐπλέο μοῦνος.) The phrase ἐπλεο μοῦνος was used once by Nonnus: ὀλβίος ἐπλεο μοῦνος (Dionysiaca 16.337; cf. 47.372). It was also used three times in the Homeric Psalter by Apollinaris in reference to God (15.2, 83.25, and 92.5). But these precedents do not provide a solid suggestion for the lacuna in Dioscorus’s verse.

ἀγακλυτα δῶρα κομίς: Dioscorus had several epic precedents to help him write this clause. In Homer one finds: ὕμιν δὲ ἐν πάντεσι περικλυτα δῶρ’ ὄνωμήνω / ἐπτ’ ἀπύρους τρίποδας … “In the midst of you all, let me name the glorious gifts: seven tripods that the fire has not touched …” (Il. 9.121-122). And: … τὸν δὲ λίσσοντο γέροντες / Ἀργείων, καὶ πολλὰ περικλυτα δῶρ’ ὄνῳμαξον “And to him the elders of the Argives made prayer, and named many glorious gifts” (Il. 18.448-449). And even: ἢ δὲ ὅτε δὴ οὗ πατρὸς ἀγακλυτα δῶμαθ’ ἰκανε “But when she had come to the glorious palace of her father” (Od. 7.3; cf. 7.46). In Nonnus, we often find the clause δῶρα κομίς ending a verse, in a variety of persons and tenses (Dionysiaca 4.260, 11.128, 16.106, etc.)

But Dioscorus’s rendition is unique. What then are Theodosius’s ἀγακλυτα δῶρα? Our best clues come from the Iliad citations above—and one more. In Book 1, in a crucial scene, the virgin goddess Athena appears to Achilles and tells him to put aside his anger, and he will receive glorious gifts:

Clement A. Kuehn
But come, cease from strife, and do not grasp the sword with your hand. With words indeed taunt him, telling him how it shall be. For thus will I speak, and this thing shall truly be brought to pass. Hereafter three times as many glorious gifts shall be yours.

(Il. 1.210-213; trans. A. T. Murray)

The similarity between Homer’s ἀγλαὰ δῶρα and Dioscorus’s ἀγακλυτὰ δῶρα is unmistakable. The gifts that Achilles eventually receives, for enduring a forced separation from the woman Briseis, are bestowed by King Agamemnon. These gifts are described in the Homeric citations above as περικλυτὰ δῶρ.’

Therefore, looking at the entire verse 16, the Homeric correspondences, and sixth-century church art, the ἀγακλυτὰ δῶρα on the allegorical level could be the reward that the virgin receives in heaven. That is: having called together the Egyptian saints in heaven as witnesses (ναετήραϲ), over whom he had authority as their former Πατριάρχης (ϲτρατίαρχε), Theodosius receives from Christ a glorious crown.
Verses 17-19

17 [πάντ]η κοιρανίης εκοπιάζετε πυθμένα ρίζης
18 [σώφ]ρονα, κυδαλίμης σοφίης ἐγκύμονα θειμῶν,
19 [το]ις προτεροίς βασιλεύσιν ἀοίδιμον ἐς θρόνον υἱα.

Contemplate always the wise foundation of the root of royalty, the basis which is pregnant with the laws of glorious Wisdom, and which is the Son on the throne, whom the earlier kings are praising in song.

The Theodosius section of Poem 17 recto began with a quatrain (verses 11-14) and ends here with a rhyming triplet (verses 17-19). The triplet is joined together grammatically: the direct object πυθμένα in verse 17 has two modifying adjectives in verse 18, σώφρονα and ἐγκύμονα, and a noun in apposition in verse 19, υἱα. Verses 17 and 18 are especially close-knit, tied together by a rhyme sequence (see below) and by enjambment: σώφρονα. The emphasis placed on σώφρονα (because of the enjambment) and the emphasis placed on σοφίης (at the end of the rhyme sequence, and after the main caesura) underline the twin motifs of understanding and wisdom. These echo the motifs of understanding and wisdom near the beginning of the Theodosius section, and thus create a ring structure:

12 [σώφρονα]ς εὐσεβίης Θεοδοσίου πάνσοφον ἄθμα,

…

18 [σώφ]ρονα, κυδαλίμης σοφίης ἐγκύμονα θειμῶν,

Clement A. Kuehn
In addition, the adjective ἐγκύμονα “pregnant” echoes the “life-bringing” adjective of verse 1, φερέϲβιοϲ, and creates a ring structure for the entire recto portion of the poem.

The last word in verse 16, κομίϲηϲ, initiates a rhyme sequence in the following verses, 17 and 18. (Compare the alliteration strategy in verses 15 and 16, where the last word of verse 15 ναετῆραϲ initiates the shift to final sigmas in verse 16.) The rhyme is placed at crucial junctures in the verse: at the end of verse 16, the end of the first half of verse 17, the end of the second half of verse 17, the end of the first half of verse 18, and the beginning of the second half of verse 18:

16 || … κομίϲηϲ.

17 … κοιρανίηϲ || … ῥίζηϲ

18 … κυδαλίµηϲ || σοφίηϲ …

This remarkable rhyme sequence puts especially strong emphasis on the word σοφίηϲ “wisdom”, which is out of rhythm (the rhyming word is at the beginning of the half verse and not the end) and concludes the whole rhyme sequence.

There is also a chiasmic structure that ties the three verses together: the noun-adjective pair of verses 17 and 18 (πυθµένα … ἐγκύμονα) has in apposition the adjective-noun pair of verse 19: ἀοίδιµον υἱα.

Note also the tricolon crescens (ascending) and tricolon diminuens (descending) of syllable length in verse 17: two-four-five-three-two. The verb σκοπιάζετε is at the apex, and therefore in a high position to “watch”. There is a paronomasia (word play) between the verb σκοπιάζω (“to spy from a high place” or “to watch”) and the noun ἐπίσκοπος (“overseer”), which denotes anyone that has a supervisory position in the Church. Theodosius, the thirty-third Patriarch of Alexandria, was at the apex of the tricolon crescens/diminuens in verse 12. Here, however, the plural imperative κοπιάζετε shows that the Egyptian saints have responded to Theodosius’s call in verse 15 and have joined him. They are being addressed by the poet.

Clement A. Kuehn

The complexity of the word order and grammar of verses 17-19 creates a subtle image (invisible, so to speak) of an intertwined root or vine. Dioscorus was a master of euphony, word placement, and subtlety.

κοιρανίης: The same word is used at Heitsch 2.1, and an adjectival variation κοιρανική is used at Heitsch 3.36. The noun appears three times in this poem (verses 17, 21 a reconstruction, and 22), and is therefore significant. Its importance is further emphasized by the hyperbaton: κοιρανίης … ῥίζης “of the root of royalty”.

The noun κοιρανία “sovereignty” is not used by Homer, but it is epic and used by Nonnus, Colluthus, and contemporaries of Dioscorus, including Paul the Silentiary (Descriptio Sanctae Sophiae, line 982) and Agathias (Anthologia Graeca, Book 16, epigram 41, line 4). It might be noteworthy that in the Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John, Nonnus uses the word to describe the purple robe that was put on Jesus to mock him (cf. the discussion of ἀλουργίδα at verse 14 above). Nonnus writes that the soldiers put on the robe, σύμβολα κοιρανίης καὶ ἐν ἀλγεσιν “the symbol of royalty and with grief” (Paraphrasis 19:11). When Theodosius was deceptively robbed of his Patriarchy, he suffered terribly. According to the History of the Patriarchs, Severus, the Patriarch of Antioch (512-519), who himself was a fugitive from the Emperor Justinian, comforted Theodosius at Sakha in Egypt. This was because “Father Theodosius suffered continual trouble and persecution from the heretics [i.e. Chalcedonians]” (p. 457). But that the word κοιρανία would make a connection within the audience between the painful shame of Christ, as described by Nonnus, and the persecution of Theodosius—that is too much to suggest.

κοπιάζετε : There is a grammatical problem with the verb number. κοπιάζετε is plural, but the verbs in the previous verse (ἔπλεο … κομίσης) are singular. There are two possible reasons for the change. The first is that the “inhabitants” have heard the saint’s call, and there is now a group. This interpretation moves the action of the hymn forward, and sits well with the rest of the sentence. The second solution is that the poet is addressing Theodosius with the royal plural. Whatever the reason, the verb stands in strong contrast with the beginning of verse 16, where the solitude of Saint Theodosius is stressed: ἔπλεο μοῦνος. Dioscorus often makes use of contrast (from complex grammar to simple grammar, from large words to small words, etc.) to move the poem forward.

κοιρανίης … πυθμένα ὑζης : The grammatical relationship between these three words is complex. First, is κοιρανίης a descriptive genitive of ὑζης? In other words: is the noun acting like the adjective κοιρανικός and is the meaning “the royal root”? Perhaps not, since Dioscorus is familiar with the adjectival form, which he uses in another poem: ἐγγύθι κοιρανικοῦ σέθεν οὐνομα λ[ά]μψεν [Ὀλ]ύμπου {c} “your name shines up to sovereign Olympus” (Poem 11.36; Heitsch 3.36).

Clement A. Kuehn
The external parallels support another interpretation. On the one hand, the core meaning of ῥίζα is “root” as the base of a plant or vine (Il. 11.846; Od. 10.304; 23.196; etc.), and it then comes to mean the base or foundation or source of anything. We find it used to designate the root of the hair (Plato, Phaedrus 251b), the foundations of the earth (Hesiodus, Opera et Dies 19), the stock of a family (Pindarus, Olympian 2.46), etc. On the other hand, one of the most common motifs in the New Testament is that Christ is the base or source of holiness and eternal life. A frequent image is that he is the vine and his disciples are the branches. The term used in the New Testament is ἄμπελος:

Ἐγὼ εἰμί ἡ ἄμπελος ἡ ἀληθινὴ καὶ ὁ πατήρ μου ὁ γεωργός ἐστιν. πᾶν κλῆμα ἐν ἐμοὶ μὴ φέρον καρπὸν αἴρει αὐτὸ, καὶ πᾶν τὸ καρπὸν φέρον καθαίρει αὐτὸ ἵνα καρπὸν πλείονα φέρῃ. ἤδη ὑμεῖς καθαροὶ ἐστε διὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν λελάληκα ὑμῖν· μείνατε ἐν ἐμοὶ καὶ καθὼς τὸ κλῆμα οὐ δύναται καρπὸν φέρειν ἀφʼ ἑαυτοῦ ἐὰν ὑμῖν· καθὼς τὸ κλῆμα οὐ δύναται καρπὸν φέρειν ἀφʼ ἑαυτοῦ ἐὰν μὴ μένη ἐν τῇ ἄμπελῳ, οὕτως οὐδὲ ὑμεῖς ἐὰν μὴ ἐν ἐμοὶ μένητε. ἐγὼ εἰμί ἡ ἄμπελος, ὑμεῖς τὰ κλῆματα.

I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches. (Jo. 15:1-5)
Although the Bible does not use the word ῥίζα for this image (and neither does Nonnus at Paraphrasis 15.1-14), it does use the Dioscorian word in a similar image. In the parable of the seeds, if the shoot does not have a root, ῥίζαν, it withers at the time of persecution: διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν ῥίζαν ἐξηράνθη (Mt. 13:6, 21; cf. Mc. 4:6, 17; Lc. 8:13). And in the Epistles of St. Paul, the root ῥίζα takes on a broader range of meanings—all relating to Christ as the foundation and the source. For examples: καὶ εἰ ἡ ῥίζα ἁγία, καὶ οἱ κλάδοι (Rom. 11:16); καὶ συγκοινωνοῦς τῆς ῥίζης τῆς πιστεύσης τῆς ἐλαίας ἐγένο (Rom. 11:17); and finally: οὐ σὺ τὴν ῥίζαν βαστάζεις ἀλλὰ ἡ ῥίζα σέ. “Thou bearest not the root, but the root thou.” (Rom. 11:18)

Dioscorus here is using the term ῥίζα in the biblical sense: as a metaphor for Christ the foundation and source. Theodosius and the saints are encouraged to “continue contemplating always the root.” (The imperative is in the present tense, and the adverb is probably πάντη.) With the phrase πυθµένα ῥίζης, Dioscorus is perhaps building on the parable of the seeds, and Christ is the foundation of the roots. More likely, Dioscorus is employing pleonasm: the foundation of the foundation, the base of the base, the root of the root. This poetic pleonasm emphasizes the concept that Christ is indeed the source of all sovereignty: “the root of royalty”. He is the donor of the crowns of sainthood and the source of eternal life in the kingdom of heaven.

The following verse, verse 18, is one of the most complex in the poem. Three valid interpretations are possible. Each fits into the context of the poem, and all three are interrelated and can co-exist together. In a verse that emphasizes understanding and wisdom, perhaps Dioscorus is testing the wits of his audience.

Clement A. Kuehn
κυδαλίμης: This adjective is derived from the noun κόδος (see Philoxenus, Fragment 255*, line 3; cf. Orion, Etymologicum, epsilon, page 62, line 16). The adjective was used frequently by Homer as an epithet for heroes such as Achilles, Odysseus, and Menelaus. It was also used to describe the noble heart (κήρ) of Agamemnon and Achilles (Il. 10.16, 18.33). In the 6th century κυδάλιμος meant “with glory” or “with honor” (Hesychius, Lexicon, kappa, entry 4404, line 1). The adjective was not used by Nonnus, but it was used in three other surviving poems by Dioscorus, and always in the phrase: κυδαλίμων πατέρων ἀπὸ ρίζης όλβιστήρων (Heitsch 4a.4, 6.2, 13.4). The phrase κυδάλιμη σοφία appears nowhere else in Greek literature, until the thirteenth century and Theodorus Metochites (τῶνδε σοφίης κυδαλίμωι Carmen ad Nicephorum Callistum Xanthopulum, line 276).

[ϲώφ]ρονα … ἐγκύονα: Developing the metaphor of the root above, Dioscorus now personifies it. He says that the root (more precisely, “the base of the root”) has understanding and is pregnant.

쏘φίς ἐγκύμονα θεσμῶν: Dioscorus purposefully presents us with a grammatical choice. The adjective ἐγκύμονα takes a genitive, and Dioscorus sandwiches it between two genitives. The adjective appears often in Nonnus, but he does not solve the problem: sometimes the genitive follows the adjective (Dionysiaca 17.303, 21.302, 37.147, etc.), and sometimes it comes before (Dionysiaca 42.197, 43.66, 47.42, etc.). Three different meanings are possible, depending on the choice.

Clement A. Kuehn
Meaning #1: Christ (the root and vine) produces wise people (the branches) that write laws (their fruit). In this interpretation, the adjective ἐγκύμονα takes the genitive σοφίς. This interpretation is supported by Dioscorus’s other use of the phrase in Poem 5.10 (Heitsch 6.10): τῆς πολυκαλλίστης σοφίς ἐγκύμονι πάσης. Here there is no other genitive noun, so σοφίς must be dependent on ἐγκύμονι. In Meaning #1, the word “wisdom” (σοφίς) is a metonymy for “wise people”. And the noun θεϲῶν is an objective genitive, meaning that wise people create laws.

Meaning #2: Christ (the root and vine) is filled with the Holy Spirit (Sophia), which inspired the Old Testament, New Testament, and Apostolic Law. This interpretation is supported by biblical imagery and Christian literature. Sophia was sometimes equated in Christian literature with the third person of the Trinity (see Lampe, s.v. σοφία C 2). And Christ was very clear that his Spirit was the Holy Spirit, which he would distribute to his disciples only after he had ascended into heaven. In a biblical passage that shows parallels to the imagery of verses 17-18, Christ tells his apostles a parable about vines, branches, and bearing fruit (Jo. 15:1-26; cf. Act. 1:1-2 and 2:33). He then encourages them to keep his commandments, which he had spoken through the Spirit, and promises that he will send the Spirit from heaven to help them. According to Christian doctrine, it was this same Spirit that had spoken through the prophets, including Moses; see οὗτος οὖν, ὁν πνεῦμα θεοῦ καὶ ἁρχὴ καὶ σοφία καὶ δύναμις υψίστου, κατήρχετο εἰς τούς προφήτας καὶ δι’ αὐτῶν ἐλάλει τὰ περὶ τῆς ποιήσεως τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν ἀπάντων (Theophilus, Ad Autolycum, Book 2, section 10, line 12). According to biblical tradition, the prophet Moses wrote the first five books of the Bible, the Pentateuch. See: Ἀὗται αἱ ἐντολαὶ καὶ τὰ δικαιώματα καὶ τὰ κρίματα, ἣ ἐνετέλατο κύριος ἐν χειρὶ Μωυσῆ ἐπὶ δυσμῶν Μωαβ ἐπὶ τοῦ Ιορδάνου κατὰ Ιεριχω. “These are the commandments and the judgments and the decrees that the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses in the plains of Moab by the Jordan near Jericho.” (Num. 36:13) These books were called the Law of Moses. The Christian terms were ὁ νόμος Μωϋσέως and ὁ νόμος διὰ Μωϋσέως. Christ himself, inspired by the Holy Spirit, gave a new law: Ἐντολὴν καινὴν δίδωμι ὑμῖν, ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους, καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους. “A new commandment I give unto you: That ye love one another, as I have loved you that ye also love one another” (Jo. 13:34). And Christ’s apostles and their descendents continued to write laws for the Church, as seen in the Acta apostolorum 15:1-33, the Didaché, the Traditio apostolica, etc. Thus the adjective ἐγκύμονα takes Σοφίης as its genitive, and Σοφίης is a genitive of source for θεϲῶν: Christ is filled with the Holy Spirit, which inspires religious Laws.

Clement A. Kuehn

Meaning #3: Christ (the root and vine) produces laws that are gloriously wise. In this interpretation, the adjective ἐγκύμονα takes the genitive θεϲῶν and the phrase κυδαλίηϲ Σοφίηϲ is a descriptive genitive of those laws. In this interpretation, Dioscorus applies a technique of poetic brevitas. Specifically he uses praegnans constructio, by which two clauses are condensed into one. It involves the omission of some logical steps, which can be understood from the context. In agriculture, the root produces a vine that produces branches, and the branches must remain on the vine in order to flourish and bear fruit. In the biblical use of this imagery, which is frequent, Christ is the root and the vine, his disciples are the branches, and their good works are the good fruit. In Dioscorus’s praegnans constructio, in a collapsing sequence, the root is pregnant with the good fruit, which are “the laws of glorious wisdom”.

Clement A. Kuehn

[τοῖϲ προτερ]οἶϲ βασιλεύϲιν ἀοίδιμον ἐϲ θρόνων νία : Verse 18 above was complex in its rhyme and meaning. Verse 19, in contrast, is simple in meaning and purpose. It serves to conclude Part Three of the recto side of Poem 17, and tie it together.

[τοῖϲ προτερ]οἶϲ βασιλεύϲιν : the restoration is by Maspero. It appears too long for the lacuna, but the meaning fits well. The throne or the Son is being praised by the twelve Old Testament patriarchs and twelve apostles, who had arrived in heaven before Theodosius. This is an Apocalyptic image.

The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever. And they cast their crowns before the throne, saying: “Thou art worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honour and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.

(Apoc. 4:10-11; cf. Apoc. 14:3; etc.)

Clement A. Kuehn
ἀοίδιμος: literally “the subject of song”. This adjective could apply to either θρόνον or υἷα. The meaning remains the same, but in the former case, it is a transferred epithet. The adjective appears once in Homer, but in a negative context (Il. 6.358). It is never used by Nonnus. It is used only once in biblical literature (Macch. IV 10:1), but frequently in Christian literature. The word ἀοίδιμος and related compounds, such as παναοίδιμος, are frequently used by Dioscorus (Heitsch 4a.9, 4b.8, cf. verse 5 above and Heitsch 20.5, 23.15, 24.6, and 24.23). Dioscorus uses the word most often to modify the word “name”: ἀοίδιμον οὖνομ’ (see verse 5 above and Heitsch 4a.9, 4b.8, 20.5; cf. Heitsch 24.6). Nowhere else does Dioscorus or anyone use it to modify θρόνος. The word is used to modify υἱόν by the Syballine Oracle (2 B.C. - A.D. 4): Ἀθανάτου μέγαν υἱὸν ἀοίδιμον ἐκ φρενὸς αὐδῶ, ὃ θρόνον ὕψιστος γενέτης παρέδωκε λαβέσθαι οὔπω γεννηθέντι. (Oracula Sibyllina, section 6, line 1) υἷα: This word, the last of Poem 17 recto, is in apposition to πυθµένα ῥίζης, the “root of the root”, the “foundation of the foundation”, the “source of the source”. Here it confirms that the root is the Son, who is filled with Sophia, or with the laws of Sophia. It ties the three verses 17-19 together grammatically. It also echoes the υἷα of verse 7, who is also the Son of God and the subject of song: [ὑµνε]ıyca νέον υἷα. Even in the Theodosius section, the poet returns ultimately to Christ.

Clement A. Kuehn
Figures 21-22. Antinoöpolis. The emperor Hadrian built the city, in a magnificent Hellenistic style, to honor his friend Antinous, who had drowned there in AD 130.
Figures 23-24. Antinoöpolis. Some of the ancient buildings were still visible when Napoleon Bonaparte visited the site c. 1800. They were dismantled in the 20th century to build factories. Copyright © 2011 by Clement A. Kuehn.
Figure 25. Antinoöpolis. Foreign visitors were barred from the region in 1995, when these photos were taken. Foreign excavations were allowed to resume in 2000. Hellenistic architecture, seen here, and a large number of Greek literary papyri were among the discoveries.

Figure 26 (following page). Romeo and Juliet in Egypt. © 2011 Clement A. Kuehn
COMMENTARY TO POEM 17 VERSO

Verses 20-35: Christ

Verse 20

Rejoice with me, kings, famous for eternity!

Dioscorus flipped the piece of papyrus topsy-turvy and continued writing on the verso side (the back). Thus the letters on the verso are upside-down in relation to the letters on the recto side (the front). Dioscorus is now writing with the direction of the papyrus fibers, which tends to make the writing flow (ductus) smoother.

Poem 17 verso is probably a continuation of Poem 17 recto. The style, vocabulary, and motifs are similar. The plural vocative βαϲιλῆεϲ of verse 20 picks up the plural βαϲιλεῦϲιν of verse 19, with a slight change in meaning. And the plural imperative verb of the first sentence of the verso [χαίρε]τέ echoes the plural imperative of the last sentence of the recto σκοπιάζετε. On the surface level, Dioscorus is still addressing the official image of the new emperor, which has arrived at Antinoöpolis. On the surface level, the plural vocative and imperative are poetic, magnifying the sovereignty. On the allegorical level, the earlier kings of verse 19 were the patriarchs of the twelve tribes of Israel and the twelve apostles: the twenty-four kings of the Apocalypse of John. Now in verse 20 Dioscorus is addressing the recent saints, who are present spiritually at the feastday rite and present in the church images and icons.

Clement A. Kuehn
The restoration is by Maspero. χαίρω is Homeric and means “be glad”, “be joyful”, or “rejoice”. The verb in the imperative was commonly used as a salutation in all periods of Antiquity. Dioscorus uses the imperative verb in the singular at Poem 9.1 (Heitsch 20.1, a restoration) and in the plural at Poem 41.4 (Heitsch 27.2). The phrase χαίρετέ μοι is found in Classical poetry, including Aristophanes (Lysistrata 1074), in biblical literature (in the phrase χαίρετε καὶ συγχαίρετε μοι Phil. 2:18), and often in Christian literature. Its appearance in the poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus is especially informative:

Χαίρετε, ὦ βασιλῆεϲ, ἐμῶν παθέων ἐπαρωγοί;
Χαίρε μοι, ἄντολή καὶ δύσι μαρνάμεναι;
Χαίρετέ μοι, ἱερῆεϲ, ἐπ’ ἄλληλοις ἰόντεϲ;
Χαίρε, πρόεδρε τύφε: χαίρε, πόλες μεγάλη.
Αὐτὰρ ἐγὼ χθονίων μὲν ὑπέρτερος εἰμι θοόκων,
Ἰμείρω δὲ μόνου κύδεος ἀθανάτου.
Rejoice, O kings, helpers in my suffering;
Rejoice with me, you who do battle in the morning and evening;
Rejoice with me, priests, going to one another;
Rejoice, presiding nonsense; rejoice, great city.
Truly I am higher than the earthly seats,
I seek eternal glory alone.
(Carmina de se ipso, page 1261, lines 3-8)
Without becoming sidetracked by a discussion of these verses, one should observe that Gregory is making fun of earthly honors while glorifying the heavenly. The poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus was popular among educated Egyptians, and it would not be far-fetched to suggest that Dioscorus was alluding to this passage. Perhaps Dioscorus and Gregory were also influenced by the the conclusion of the Apocalypse. There, at the destruction of Babylon and the beast of earthly sovereignty (Apoc. 18:1-24), the old and new kings of heaven sing a song of praise, while contemplating the source of all kingship and judgement. The martyrs are given thrones and reign with Christ for a thousand years before all other saints.

And after these things I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying: “Alleluia! Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God! For true and righteous are his judgments ... .” And again they said: “Alleluia! And her smoke goes up for ever and ever.”
And the four and twenty elders and the four beasts fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying: “Amen! Alleluia!” ... And I saw thrones and they who sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them. And I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads or on their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. (Apoc. 19:1-20:4)

One can assume that, in an environment as vibrantly Christian as Upper Egypt, Dioscorus was familiar with the Bible. Although a Bible text was not found in his archive, most of the people named in his documents were monks, priests, or other religious, and he alludes to biblical imagery in his legal petitions. Yet we are not looking for verbal parallels between the Hymn to St.
Theodosius and biblical literature. That was not the style of this hymn.
Dioscorus was suggesting and sometimes openly presenting Christian themes in an Homeric vocabulary, as had been done by Nonnus, Apollonaris, Eudocia, and other poets before him.

ἐπὶ χρόνον ἄσπετον: This phrase is found in two other poems by Dioscorus, Poem 8.7 (Heitsch 19.7) and Poem 4.35 (Heitsch 12b.17). The adjective ἄσπετος (literally “unspeakable” or “inexpressible”) is used by Homer and Nonnus. The phrase means “for an inexpressibly long time” or “eternally.”

Clement A. Kuehn
εὐκ[λ]ειϲ: The restoration is by me and replaces an awkward earlier reading. In the two other uses of the preceding phrase by Dioscorus we find: ἐπὶ χρόνον ἀσπετοῦν εἶναι and ἐπὶ χρόνον ἀσπετοῦν ἐλθοῖ, neither of which verbs fit the surviving marks on the papyrus here. Maspero suggested the verb εὐδειϲ (for εὐδης), but the restoration is clumsy grammatically: a singular verb at the end of a verse that used a plural verb and vocative at the beginning. Yet εὐδης was accepted by Heitsch, MacCoull, and Fournet. The restoration also makes little sense. The verb εὐδω means “to sleep” and that is how Dioscorus uses it in another poem (Poem 39.10, Heitsch 28.10). It can also refer to the sleep of death (Il.14.482; Sophocles, Oedipus Coloneus 621). Some editors have argued that here the verb means “to be inactive” (Sophocles, Oedipus Coloneus 307; Plato, Phaedrus 267a) in the sense “to be tranquil” or even “to be happy”. These meanings are not attested elsewhere. The adjective εὐκ[λ]ειϲ is from εὐκλεής (“glorious” or “renowned”) and is the contracted form of the vocative and nominative epic plural masculine. It matches the papyrus evidence and makes sense in the context. The adjective was used by Homer and Nonnus, and is employed by Dioscorus in his other poems (Heitsch 7.7 ἐυκλεής βασιλεὺς and 12b.18).

Verses 21-22

[κοιρα]γήϲ αὐτάνευθε τεῦϲ φθόνοϲ αἰὲν ἀλάϲθω, [.....] κοιρανίϲ φθόνοϲ ἔρπελοϲ αἰὲν ἀλάϲθω.

Let envy wander far away forever from your sovereignty,
[.....] let envy, creeping forever, wander from your sovereignty.

Clement A. Kuehn
Note the effective alliteration and word placement. The preposition/adverb, adverb, and verb (ἀπάνευθε ... αἰὲν ἀλάςθω) are tied together by the alliteration and assonance of alpha sounds, but the preposition/adverb ἀπάνευθε is in fact “far away” from the rest of the verbal group. The preposition/adverb also separates the word “envy” from the word “sovereignty”: [κοιρα]γίης ἀπάνευθε | | ... φθόνος. The style enhances the meaning of the verse: “Let envy wander far away ... from your sovereignty.” The separation is further emphasized by the main caesura (feminine), which comes right after the word ἀπάνευθε.

The poet made several changes to these verses. Originally he had written:

[.....] κοιρανίης φθόνος ἔρπελος αἰὲν ἀλάςθω

Then he squeezed [κοιρα]γίης ἀπάνευθε τεῆς φθόνος αἰὲν ἀλάςθω between the verses. He wrote ἔρπελος εἴη in the right hand margin after the new verse, but there is no indication that he decided to replace αἰὲν ἀλάςθω with ἔρπελος εἴη.

There is obviously a repetitive quality in these two verses. They recall the repetition at the beginning of Poem 17 recto, and evoke the religious context of Dioscorus’s hymn. This kind of repetition recalls religious litanies, such as those found before the Scripture readings in the Coptic liturgies. One can compare the Hymn of the Intercessions and even more specifically, the Great Litany for the Church Fathers in the Liturgy of St. Basil, which incorporates an effective use of repetition and variation. “Accept their prayers on our behalf and for Your people, as well as our prayers for them. Receive and accept these prayers, as a sweet aroma, on your holy, eloquent and heavenly altar.” The repetition puts a strong emphasis on the changed element: the metaphor of incense and the heavenly altar. Scriptural repetition in a Homeric vocabulary can be seen in Psalm 150 of the Homeric Psalter by Apollinaris, which is labeled a “Song of Praise” (μέλος ἀλληλούϊα) or a doxology: Μέλψατε μοι βασιλῆα, χοροὶ δ’ ἀμ’ ἔποιητο δικαίων, / μέλψατε μυν σταθερῇ κράτεος περιθάρσων ἀλκή, etc. “Sing with me of the King, and let the choruses of the righteous follow, / sing of Him, confident in the firm strength of his sovereignty” (verses 1-2).

Clement A. Kuehn

In Dioscorus, the tiny verbal changes highlight the change in sense of the second verse. In the second verse, the preposition/adverb ἀπόνευθε has been removed and envy has crept closer to the sovereignty: that is κοιράνης ἀπόνευθε τεῆς φθόνος is replaced by κοιράνης φθόνος. This periscopic movement is underlined by the new word in the second verse: ἐρπελος “creeping”. The adjective ἐρπελος also stresses the foreign nature of envy, which does not belong among the devout: the word is a hapax legomenon. This is the only appearance of the adjective in Greek literature. Dioscorus apparently created the word from the verb ἐρπω (which is related to the Latin word serpo, from which our English word serpent is derived). The verb ἐρπω means “creep” or “crawl”. Thus Dioscorus personifies the emotion Envy by giving it a snake-like attribute. In Christian exegesis, the snake in the garden of Paradise was Satan, who plotted the destruction of the new humans because of envy. See, for instance, John Chrysostom’s homily to Psalm 75: φθόνῳ δὲ τοῦ διαβόλου θάνατος εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον. “Death entered into the world through the envy of the devil.” (In Psalmum 75 [Sp.], vol. 55, page 597, line 46; cf. Gen. 3:1-5, 13-15; Job 1:1-12; etc.) Anastasius of Sinai, in the 7th century, made the point even clearer in a fictional warning from God to Adam in Paradise:
Καὶ ἔστι νῦν πονηρὸς ὁ µοῦ καὶ φθονερός, καὶ μέλλει φθονῆσαί σου τῇ δόξῃ, ὦ Ἀδάµ, καὶ τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ σου καὶ τῷ κατ’ εἰκόνα Θεοῦ κάλλει σου. Μέλλει ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ύμᾶς. Μέλλει προσβαλεῖν ύμῖν, εἴτε ἀπατήσαι, ἢν διὰ τῆς ὁδοῦ, ἢς ἐκεῖνος ἔπεσε, πλανήσῃ καὶ ἀποστερήσῃ τῆς δόξης καὶ τῆς τιμῆς καὶ τῆς ἐξουσίας, ἢς ἔχαρισαµην ύµῖν, ὅπως µὴ ἔλθητε εἰς τὸν κόσµον, δὲ οὗ ἐκεῖνος ἔξεσε.

"Now he is both evil and envious. And he is about to become envious of your glory, O Adam, and your authority, and your beauty in the image of God. He is about to come to you. He is about to attack you, and so deceive you, so that you might wander along the path by which he fell. So that you might be deprived of the glory and honor and power with which I graced you. So that you might not arrive at that place from which he fell."

(Hexaemeron 9.224-229)

Anastasius could not have influenced Dioscorus, but Anastasius relied heavily on the early allegorical exegetes of Alexandria and Gregory of Nazianzus.

For his malicious envy, Satan was cursed and punished by God to crawl on his belly and eat dirt: καὶ ἔπειν κύριος ὁ θεὸς τῷ ὄφει· Ὁτι ἐποίησας τὸ τῆς γῆς κτισματος ἄπαντας καὶ ἐπὶ τῷ στήθει σου καὶ τῇ κοιλίᾳ πορεύσῃ καὶ γῆν φάγῃ πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ζωῆς σου. “And the Lord God said unto the serpent: ‘Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle and above every beast of the field: upon thy belly shalt thou go and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life’.” (Gen. 3:14) But the serpent was not removed. And in the book of Job, Satan is in heaven in front of the throne of God, still enviiously malicious, and still wreaking havoc on earth:

Clement A. Kuehn
Then Satan answered and said to the Lord: “Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made an hedge about him and about his house and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.” And the Lord said unto Satan: “Behold, all that he hath is in thy power: only upon himself put not forth thine hand.” (Job 1:9-12)

In one masterful couplet, Dioscorus condensed the biography of Satan to its essence, and expressed his own fear of the serpent’s envy.

[κοιρα]γής : In this couplet we find the third appearance of this noun within six verses. As pointed out in the commentary to Poem 17 recto, the same word is used at Poem 20.1 (Heitsch 2.1) and an adjectival variation κοιρανικ[οῦ] is used at Poem 11.36 (Heitsch 3.36). The noun κοιρανία “sovereignty” is not used by Homer, but it is epic and used by Nonnus, Colluthus, and contemporaries of Dioscorus, including Paul the Silentiary and Agathias.
In a type of antanaclasis, the word κοιρανία changes meaning each time Dioscorus uses it. In verse 17, it is synonymous with κράτος as used at Il. 2.118: τὸ γὰρ κράτος ἔστι µέγιστον “for his authority is the greatest” (cf. Od. 1.359). God is the source of all authority. See Christ’s response to Pilate: ἀπεκρίθη αὐτῷ Ἰησοῦς· οὐκ εἶχες ἐξουσίαν κατ’ ἐμοῦ οὐδεμίαν εἰ µὴ ἦν δεδοµένον σοι ἀνωθεν· διὰ τούτο ὁ παραδούς µέ σοι µείζονα ἀµαρτίαν ἔχει. “Jesus answered: ‘Thou couldest have no power at all against me except it were given thee from above, therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin’.” (Jo. 19:11). In verse 21 (a restoration), it is synonymous with the King himself, as the word κράτος at Aeschylus, Agamemnon 109: Ἀχαιῶν δίθρονον κράτος “the twin-throned command of the Achaeans” (cf. 619 and Septem contra Thebas 127). It was a standard Classical motif that the divinities grew jealous of human power and success. In the third instance, the word κοιρανία is synonymous with the dominion under rule, as the word κράτος at Herodotus, Historiae 3.69: οὔτοι µιν σοί τε συγκοιµώµενον καὶ τὸ Περσέων κράτος ἔχοντα δεῖ χαίροντα ἀπαλλάσσειν ἄλλα δοῦναι δίκην. “He must not get away with sleeping with you and sitting on the throne of Persia, but be punished.” (cf. Aristophanes, Thesmophoriazusae 871; and Thucydides, Historiae 4.98) Envy has no place among the Christian faithful, which is the dominion of Christ. In an analogy with the word κράτος, I have now shown the three meanings of the word κοιρανία as used in Poem 17. (Compare the various meanings of κοιρανίη implied by Nonnus at Paraphrase 18.170; 19.11; Dionysiaca 41.391; etc.) Further lexical research on κοιρανία is needed to determine the accuracy of such an analogy.

Clement A. Kuehn
far away: “far away” is an indeclinable adverb that can also be used as a preposition (with the genitive case). It is used by Homer and Nonnus, and in another poem by Dioscorus (Poem 34.13; Heitsch 23.13). It is a strengthened form of the adverb ἄνευθε. Dioscorus chose the long form to emphasize the distance between the sovereignty κοιρά and envy φθόνος in verse 21, and to make even more striking their juxtaposition when the adverb is removed in verse 22.

τεῆς: The second person singular of the personal adjective suggests that the poet is no longer speaking to the kings of verse 20. On the surface level, the plurals forms of verse 20 could have been poetic plurals, magnifying the stature of a single king. The allegorical level did not require such an interpretation. The “kings” of verse 20 were the recent saints in heaven, as the “earlier kings” of verse 19 were the elders in heaven. To whom, on the allegorical level, is the poet now referring in verse 21? I suggest that it is again Christ. In the monumental art of the 6th century and in biblical literature, the saints are processing toward, surrounding, or contemplating Christ, God, or the Mother of God. So it would be a natural progression for Dioscorus to proceed from Saint Theodosius (verses 11-16), to all the saints in general (verses 17-20), to Christ. And Christ is again implied by the same personal adjective in verse 28. In fact, as we will see, Christ is the honoree of the entire verso.

φθόνος: The noun becomes emphatic in verse 22, not only because of the repetition and its movement closer to “sovereignty” (which is the target of the “envy”), but also because φθόνος is placed squarely after a masculine main caesura. The noun is not found in Homer, but the corresponding verb φθονέω is. The noun and corresponding verb and adjective φθονερός are found in Nonnus, who even personifies it Φθόνος (Dionysiaca 8.34, 105; etc.) It is a common word in Classical literature, where it implies envy or jealousy over someone’s good fortune. It is felt by mortals and especially by gods. The noun is also used to specify a refusal because of feelings of jealousy and ill-will. See LSJ, s.v.

Unlike much of Classical literature, a different sentiment was expressed by Plato in his Phaedrus: φθόνος γὰρ ἔξω θείου χοροῦ ἵσταται. “For envy stands outside the chorus of god.” (Stephanus page 247, section a, line 7) Here the chorus not only denotes the group of singers and dancers at a performance of tragedy or comedy, but also implies the original ritual to the god Dionysus (cf. Euripides, Bacchae 220; Heroditus, Historiae 2.48; Isocrates, Evagoras, section 1) and the place where the ritual occurs (cf. Il. 18.590; Od. 8.260, 264). The same Platonic line is repeated by Clement of Alexandria and applied to God and his Church (Stromata, Book 5, chapter 5, section 30, sub-session 5, line 1). It is repeated by Didymus the Blind, but with a variation that is close to Dioscorus: Φθόνος ἔξω θείου χοροῦ ἀπελήλασται. “Envy has been expelled from the chorus of God.” (In Genesim, codex page 110, line 24) It is the Platonic and Christian sentiment that is expressed here by Dioscorus.

Theodosius was removed from his Patriarchy of Alexandria through intrigues that were fueled by envy. Dioscorus too had experienced the destructive side of φθόνος. As explained and documented in the biography, Dioscorus was one of the headmen of the village of Aphrodito. Aphrodito had received from the emperor the privilege of autopragia, which meant that the village was given the right to collect its own imperial taxes and deliver them directly to the provincial treasury. Thus Aphrodito was outside the jurisdiction of the Pagarch of Antaeopolis, who had the authority to manage all public tax collections in his or her nome. Although for several generations (Dioscorus insists) Aphrodito had faithfully met its public tax requirements, Dioscorus’s legal documents are filled with accounts of violence by the Pagarch and his assistants: including theft of the collected tax money, collecting the tax money twice, imprisoning and torturing Aphroditan traders outside the village, and finally attacking the village itself. Dioscorus’s official petitions to the imperial house and the Duke describe blockades of the irrigation, destruction of the fields, arson of the mansions, attacks on the monasteries, and rapes of the female religious. It was the increasing violence by the Pagarch that was one of the motivations behind Dioscorus’s move to Antinoöpolis, the capital of the Thebaid. All this unlawful and ruthless violence was driven, it seems, by the Pagarch’s greed and envy of Aphrodito’s special tax status.

Of all the sins and evils that Dioscorus could have wished excluded from the Lord’s dominion, it is not surprising that he picked envy.

άλάςθω: This verb comes from the deponent ἀλάομαι, which usually appears contracted in Homer, as it does here. Although its core meaning is “to wander” or “to roam”, it carries the connotation “to be outcast” or “to be expelled”. For this reason, the verb is similar in meaning to ἀπελήλασται as used by Didymus the Blind, mentioned above: Φθόνος ἐξω θείου χοροῦ ἀπελήλασται. “Envy has been expelled from the chorus of God.” (In Genesim, codex page 110, line 24) Didymus, a fourth century Coptic theologian from Alexandria, helped develop Christian allegory through his typological exegeses of the Bible. And likewise in Job, when God asks Satan where he has been, Satan replies: Περιελθὼν τὴν γῆν καὶ ἐμπεριπατήσας τὴν ὕπ’ οὐρανὸν πάρεμι. “From going to and fro on the earth and from walking up and down in the world below heaven, I am here.” (Job 1:7) The vocabulary is different, but the imagery of roaming as an outcast is similar. Dioscorus’s choice of verbs, ἀλάςθω, strengthens his allegorical meaning that envy is the devil, who has no place in Christ’s dominion.

Clement A. Kuehn

ἐρπελὸς: As mentioned above, this adjective is a hapax legomenon, which draws attention to it. The imagery of creeping envy, however, was a commonplace in Greek literature, and the imagery in Nonnus relates directly Dioscorus:

Καϊάφα γὰρ ἔην ἐκυρὸς θρασύς, ὡς πέλε κείνου ἀρχιερεὺς λυκάβαντος, ὡς Ἑβραῖῳ ποτὲ λαῷ ζῆλον ἔχων Χριστοῖο θεηθήνων ἔνα, μὴ φθόνος ἔρπων Ἑβραῖων ὄλον ἔνας χάριν ἄνδρὸς ὀλέσσῃ. For he was the bold father-in-law of Caiaphus, who was the high priest for that year, and who in jealousy of Christ once said hubristically to the Hebrew people that it was good that one person die for the people, lest creeping envy destroy the whole race of Hebrews on account of one man. (Paraphrasis 18.64-68; cf. Jo. 11:49-50)
Caiaphus feared that the Jewish people would be destroyed by the Roman emperor because of his envy of a popular Jewish leader, Jesus. The envy concept is an addition by Nonnus, in whose works envy is a constant presence. What Dioscorus feared was that creeping envy would harm the faithful and the Church.

Verses 23-25

23 [...][... ύμετέρησιν ύπέσεσται δέσμια χεριν
24 [ήλθον] περιφόρει τραγικότερα δάκρυα λεβειν.
25 [πιστ]ιν ἀερτάζεις θεοδέγμονα κυδιανείρην.
[.....] the chains will lie beneath your hands.
[I have come] to pour out trembling, tragic tears:
you raise up the Faith that receives divinity
and glorifies humanity.

Verse 23 (as it has survived) is chained together by a hyperbaton and echoes the concept of ἐλευθερίης of verse 2. The descending climax is a coup de grâce: five syllables, four, three, two—the entire verse becomes lighter and quicker as the chains slide off. The verse is also arresting because the poet changes from the second person singular in verse 21 τεῆς to a second person plural ύμετέρησιν, which change is emphasized by the sheer size of the latter word.

Verse 24 shows a crescendo and decrescendo of syllable length, emphasizing τραγικότερα: 2-4-5-3-2. The climax of the tricolon crescens is made more emphatic by the internal rhyme of the second and third words in the series: -ικότ- and -ικώτ-. There is also an abundance of liquid rho sounds, which may be onomatopoeic, imitating the sound of weeping.

Clement A. Kuehn

When the audience heard the end of verse 25, it could not fail to notice the slight rhyme of the triplet, with the third element slightly skewed: … δέєμι χερς / … δάκρυα λέβειν / … κυδία-νείρην. It is an off-rhyme; but the last two feet (the final five syllables) of each verse, especially verses 24 and 25, were harmonious. They might have sounded even more harmonious when pronounced. Perhaps the iota, the epsilon-iota, and the eta would have carried a long ē sound. More research on the pronunciation of Byzantine Greek in Upper Egypt is necessary to make a more definitive statement, but this and all the rhetorical elements discussed above increase the musicality of the Hymn to St. Theodosius when recited.

ὑμέτερηςιν … χερς: The pronominal adjective ὑμέτερος appears in both Homer and Nonnus, and is used in two other poems by Dioscorus: Poem 11.71 (ὑμετέρων Heitsch 3.71) and 34.19 (ὑμετέρων Heitsch 23.19). What is unusual here is the iota after the eta, which is clearly written on the papyrus. The ἰ below the η, η, and ω ceased to be written with regularity around 100 B.C. The common consensus is that this iota probably was not pronounced in the Byzantine Era. Contemporary editors add it to Greek texts, as a subscript or adscript, because it is grammatically necessary. Dioscorus normally did not add this iota, but did so here, presumably to increase the size of the word. Does that indicate that the iota could be pronounced, or that he planned to publish the hymn?

Clement A. Kuehn
How are we to understand the plural pronoun here, if the addressee is no longer the saints of verse 20 but Christ? A poetic plural is certainly possible: this usage was common in the poetry of the period. It may, however, have deeper significance—as is often the case with Dioscorus. A common motif in Christian literature was that Christ was the head of the Church and all the faithful were the body. This image goes back at least to Saint Paul: οὐδεὶς γάρ ποτε τὴν ἑαυτοῦ σάρκα ἐμίσησεν ἄλλα ἐκτρέφει καὶ θάλπει αὐτὴν, καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, ὅτι μέλη ἐσμὲν τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ. “For no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church: for we are members of his body.” (Eph. 5:29-30; cf. Col. 2:19). And:

Καθάπερ γὰρ τὸ σῶμα ἐν ἑστιν καὶ μέλη πολλὰ ἔχει πάντα δὲ τὰ μέλη τοῦ σώματος πολλὰ ὄντα ἐν ἑστιν σῶμα, οὕτως καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς· καὶ γὰρ ἐν ἑνὶ πνεύματι ἤμεῖς πάντες εἰς ἑν σῶμα ἐβαπτίσθημεν, εἴτε Ἰουδαῖοι εἴτε Ἑλληνες εἴτε δοῦλοι εἴτε ἐλεύθεροι, καὶ πάντες ἐν πνεύμα ἐποτίσθημεν. καὶ γὰρ τὸ σῶμα οὐκ ἐστιν ἐν μέλος ἄλλα πολλά. … καὶ εἴτε πάσχει ἐν μέλος, συγχαίρει πάντα τὰ μέλη· εἴτε δοξάζεται μέλος, συγχαίρει πάντα τὰ μέλη. ὑμεῖς δὲ ἐστε σῶμα Χριστοῦ καὶ μέλη ἐκ μέρους.

For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. For the body is not one member, but many. … And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

Clement A. Kuehn

Therefore, in Christian thought, Christ’s body is composed of the many faithful. And that could be why we see ὑμετέρησιν and not τεσσάρις.

ὑπέσσεται δέσμια: The verb ὑπέσσεται is the future tense of ὑπείμι, which is used by Homer. Literally: “The chains will be under … .” These chains cannot be binding Christ in heaven or the saints, many of whom had been imprisoned, because Dioscorus sees their freedom in the future. So it needs to refer to the Body of Christ that is not in heaven: the faithful that are still imprisoned.

Metaphorically, Christians are chained to sin; see: βλέπω δὲ ἔτερον νόμον ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν μου ἀντιστρατευόμενον τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ νοὸς μου καὶ αἰχμαλωτίζοντα με ἐν τῷ νόμῳ τῆς ἁμαρτίας τῷ ὄντι ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν μου.

“But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members.” (Rom. 7:23; cf. 6:19; etc.) Such an interpretation here at verse 23 would not be unwarranted. It was predicted by verses 2-3 (ἐλευθερίης καὶ ἀρωγῆς / [δεινῶν εφ] ἁμάτων λαθικηδέος) and would prepare for verse 24.

There is a possibility, however, that Dioscorus is referring to the Byzantine tradition of Anastasis (also called the “Harrowing of Hell”). In Christian thought, after Christ died, he descended to the land of the dead before he himself rose. In Hades he freed Adam and Eve from the bonds of death, as a sign that all the prophets and righteous people of the Old Testament era would be freed from the bonds of sin and death at his Second Coming. This thought goes back at least to the 2nd century (Melito, De pascha = P.Beatty 8 + P.Bodmer 13 + P.Oxy. 13.1600) and was developed by Hippolytus (De antichristo), Origen (Contra Celsum 2:43), and John Chrysostom (Sermo catecheticus in pascha). These writers were relying on various biblical references to the Anastasis (Mt. 12:40; 1 Peter 3:19; 4:6; etc.). The Anastasis was often depicted in monumental art and icons, especially during the Byzantine Era. Most commonly, the image shows Christ breaking down the doors of Hades and leading Adam and Eve out by their wrists (since liberation from original sin was entirely through the action of the Saviour). Broken locks and chains lie below and the Old Testament prophets and righteous look on (often in crowns). I have not seen an example that survives from the sixth century, but the Anastasis is depicted in the Carolingian fresco (c. 825) at the Monastery of St. John in Müstair, and more clearly in the narthex of Hosios Loukas at Delphi (11th century) and the apse of St. Saviour of the Chora in Constantinople (1315-1320).

Clement A. Kuehn

Following this interpretation, verse 23 with its suggestion of Adam and Eve shows a natural movement from the serpent imagery of verse 22. The Adam and Eve motif is further developed by the imagery of falling from grace in 24.

[Ἦλθον] : The restoration is by me. Homer uses both forms of the aorist: ἧλθον and ἤλυθον, but the former is more frequent. Dioscorus also uses both forms of the aorist (see verse 10 above), but the former is more frequent (see Heitsch 2.15, 5.5, and 21.25). Dioscorus uses ἤλυθον with an infinitive of purpose above, and the same grammatical construction is used by Romanus the Melodist, a famous hymnwriter that worked in Constantinople and older contemporary of Dioscorus (Hymn 19, section 18, line 7; Hymn 27, section 7, line 6).

Clement A. Kuehn

τεφρικότα : The word φρίσσω is used by Homer and Nonnus, but only here by Dioscorus. While the core meaning of the verb is “to bristle”, it can mean “to shudder in fear” (Il. 11.383; Hymni homericici 27.8; Sophocles, Electra 1408; Aristophanes, Nubes 1133). It can also mean “to tremble in religious awe” (Plutarchus 2.26b; Julianus Imperator, Orationes 7.212b; etc.).

tραγικώτερα δάκρυα λείβειν : The word τραγικώτερα is at the apex of the tricolon crescens and tricolon diminuens, created by the number of word syllables (2-4-5-3-2). It is therefore important. Its “tragic” meaning is enhanced by the image in the following two words, δάκρυα λείβειν “to pour out tears”. The phrase δάκρυα λείβειν is common in Greek literature. In Nonnus, for example, we find: ἕχέφρονα δάκρυα λείβω (Dionysiaca 5.351); ποτάμην δάκρυα λείβων (6.224); άλλοτρία δάκρυα λείβειν (14.282); άθεα δάκρυα λείβειν (30.113); etc. Yet Dioscorus’s rendition, τραγικώτερα δάκρυα λείβειν, is found only here.

Dioscorus’s tears are “more tragic” or “very tragic” (taking the comparative as a superlative). In what way “tragic”? The adjective τραγικός is not used by Homer and only once by Nonnus: τραγικὸν χοροῦ (Dionysiaca 22.60). In Classical literature, it was commonly used to refer to the genre of tragedy. Thus we find τραγικὸς χοροῦ (Herodotus, Historiae 5.67.28), τῆς τραγικῆς σκέψεως (Plato, Respublica 577b.1), τραγικῆς σκηνῆς (Xenophon, Cyropaedia, Book 6, chapter 1, section 54), ἄνηρ τραγικὸς (= τραγῳδός Plato, Phaedo 115a.5 [Steph.]), etc. And Euripides was called τραγικώτατός γε τῶν ποιητῶν (Aristoteles, Poetica 1453a.29).

Clement A. Kuehn

What distinguishes the genre of tragedy from comedy, elegy, history, etc., is a great man’s or woman’s fall from grace through a mistake, which often involves a neglect of the divine will. Summarizing the discussion by Aristotle in his Poetics: the fall is the result not of vice, but of some great error or frailty. Such a change is likely to generate pity and fear in the audience, because pity is aroused by unmerited misfortune, fear by the misfortune of a person like ourselves. In an ideal tragedy, the protagonist mistakenly brings about his or her own downfall not because he or she is sinful or morally weak, but because he or she does not know enough.

Adam’s fall from grace, which led to his expulsion from Paradise and to corruption and death for all humanity, would fall under the category of “very tragic”. And the poet’s reaction is Aristotelian. The word τραγικός, however, is never used in biblical literature. Thus verse 24, avoiding biblical terminology, concludes the motif of Adam and Eve, which was foreshadowed in verse 22 (the envious serpent) and developed in verse 23 (the Anastasis).

[πίϲτιν ἀερτάζειϲ : The restoration [πίϲτιν is by Maspero and based on Poem 5.8 (Heitsch 6.8): πίϲτιν ἀερτάζειϲ Τριάδος μονοειδέος ὧρθήν. “Raising the orthodox faith in the Trinity, which is one God.” The Chalcedonians and Monophysites both called themselves the Orthodox Faith, ἡ πίςτις ὧρθη, which means literally “the straight faith”. The verb

Clement A. Kuehn
ἀερτάζω “to lift up” is the lengthened epic form of ἀείρω. It is not used by Homer, but often by Nonnus. It is not found in biblical literature.

The motif of “raising” is frequent and dynamic in Salvation History. Christ’s mission on earth was to redeem mankind from the ancestral sin of Adam and Eve. In so doing, Christ raised the nature of man to a higher level: to share in his divinity (Jo. 6:48-59). Christ is the resurrection and the life (Jo. 5:21-29), which he demonstrated when he raised Lazarus from the dead (Jo. 11:1-44). Christ redeemed mankind from sin and death when he was raised on a cross (Jo. 8:28-29; 12:32-33). This was prophesied by Moses when he raised the serpent from the desert sand: Καὶ καθὼς Μωϋσῆς ὑψωσεν τὸν ὄφιν ἐν τῇ ἔρημῳ οὗτος ὑψωθῆναι δεῖ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. “And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up.” (Jo. 3:14) Christ’s sacrifice was validated when God raised him from the dead: ὃν ὁ θεὸς ἀνέστησεν λύσας τὰς ὁδίνας τοῦ θανάτου καθότι οὐκ ἦν δυνατὸν κρατεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὑπ’ αὐτοῦ. “Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.” (Acts 2:24; cf. 32-33; I Cor. 6:14) Christ then rose into heaven to rejoin his Father (Jo. 17:1-26) as the forerunner of all the faithful (Hebr. 6:20). This entire Salvation History is summed up by Dioscorus in two words: [πίστ]ιν ἀερτάζεις “you raise up the Faith”. Through metonymy the abstract “faith” is used for the concrete person “the faithful”.

θεοδέγμονα: Dioscorus strengthens his allusion to the Salvation History above with the adjective θεοδέγμων, literally “receiving God”. He also continues his paronomasia (word play) on the name Θεοδοςίου (verse 12), which began with Θεοῦ δέοϲ in verse 13. The term θεοδέγµων is not used by Homer or elsewhere by Dioscorus, but is often used by Nonnus. The adjective here is emphatic, coming right after the main caesura (masculine).

The word θεοδέγµων is synonymous with θεηδόχος (cf. Anthologia Graeca 7.363) and θεοδόχος (cf. Nonnus, Dionysiaca 13.96). θεοδόχος is used in Christian literature to refer to Christ’s humanity, and thereby to the human nature of all believers who are receptive of divinity: ὁ θεοδόχος ἄνθρωπος (Gregorius Nyssenus, Oratio catechetica magna, section 32, line 28; cf. In Canticum canticorum, vol. 6, page 391, lines 2-3). Compare another instance of θεοδόχος in Gregory of Nyssa: ὡς γὰρ οὐκ ἔγνω ἡ παρθένος ὡς ἐν τῷ σώματι αὐτῆς τὸ θεοδόχον συνέστη σῶμα (In Canticum canticorum, vol. 6, page 388, lines 21-22). Therefore θεοδέγµων is the perfect word choice to describe the faithful person ([πίϲτιν, the abstract for the concrete], whom Christ raises to share in his divinity. And in a similar way θεοδέγµων was used by Dioscorus’s contemporary, Paul the Silentiary, in his description of an image of St. Paul, who was “full of every God-receiving wisdom”: Παῦλος, ὅλης σοφίς θεοδέγµονος ἔµπλεος ἀνήρ (Descriptio Sanctae Sophiae 787).

κυδιανείρην: The adjective κυδιάνειρα means literally “man-ennobling” or “bringing men glory”. It was used by Homer to modify μάχη: σπεύδωντα μάχην ἐς κυδιάνειραν “hurrying to man-ennobling battle” (Il. 4.225; cf. 6.124; etc.); and once for ἀγορά: εἰς ἀγορὴν πωλέσκετο κυδιάνειραν “to the man-ennobling assembly” (Il. 1.490). In the Orphic Hymns, it was used as an epithet for Φύσις (Orphici hymni 10.5). Thus it appears that Dioscorus is employing syllepsis: while [πίστ]ιν is best understood in most of the verse as an abstract for the concrete, “the faithful”, at the close of the verse, when modified by κυδισινείρην, it must be understood as the abstract “faith”.

Clement A. Kuehn

Verses 26-28

26 [μή τ]ρομέεις, κειμπτούχε, τὸ σῶν κλέος οὖ ποτ’ ὀλεῖται.

27 [ε]τήφος ψικάρηνον πάμφυλον ἐκκιβώτιν,

28 [ἀκτ]ίνες ἀστράπτουσι τετῆς περικαλλέος ὀμφῆς.

Do not be afraid, you who hold the scepter, your glory will never fade: you are the lofty crown of all the tribes, you are the poor man’s coffer, [the rays of your lovely voice illuminate like lightning.]

Verse 26 was written after verse 27 (like verse 21). That is, it was squeezed interlinear between verses 25 and 27. There is no indication that it was replacing anything. Its purpose perhaps was to clarify the “you” of the two verbs ἀερτάζεις and ἔςι: the vocative κειμπτούχε suggests that the addressee on the allegorical level is Christ (but see the discussion of πολυκήπτρου at verse 27). It does not seem a very powerful verse. There is assonance of the repeated short omicrons, and there is an abundance of short, quick words, but the thought is standard. It is no more than a transition to the creative metaphors of verse 27.

While the entire poem is highly original, verse 27 is exceptionally bold in its metaphors and exceptionally effective. Note the seemingly chiasmic construction—noun, adjective, adjective, noun. The adjectives increase the distance between the nouns and emphasize the polarity of the two metaphors:

Clement A. Kuehn
crown and poor-box. The chiasmus, however, is only in appearance. It seems that the adjective πάµφυλον should go with the noun κιβώτιν, which would give a nice rhetorical balance to the verse and would be grammatically correct. This arrangement, however, does not make sense. Instead, the adjective πάµφυλον goes with ζτέφος, heaping up that verbal image into an even more massive crown while making the poor box smaller. The poor-box is diminished even further by the poet’s unusual contraction of the already diminutive noun. The original noun is κιβωτός “box”; the diminutive form is κιβώτιον “a little box”. And Dioscorus contracted the final two vowels to create an even smaller word: κιβώτιν. With these two images, the very large crown and the small poor box, the poet is saying in a fresh new way that Christ is the first and the last, the alpha and the omega.

The consonance of verse 28 is striking: each word ends with a sigma, except ἀϲτράπτουϲ, which has sigmas in the second and second-to-last positions. The consonance is onomatopoeic, reproducing the sizzle of lightning.

As mentioned earlier, the assonance and consonance add to the musicality of this hymn when recited.

[µη τ]ροµέειϲ : The verb τροµέω means literally “to tremble”, and often connotes fear. It is used by Homer, Nonnus, and often by Dioscorus (Heitsch 2.14, 3.35, 4a.6, 5.14, 21.24, 24.16). The phrase µη τροµέειϲ is used in two other Dioscorian poems, which is the reason for the restoration by Maspero (Poem 11.35, 35.16; Heitsch 3.35, 24.16). In these three uses of the negative phrase, Dioscorus employs the indicative in place of the optative (τροµέοιϲ). It is possible, but unlikely (see below), that Dioscorus misspelled the word through the influence of iotacism. It is also possible, and quite likely, that Dioscorus wanted an imperative mood. This conjecture was made by

Clement A. Kuehn
Maspero and is based on an analogy with the verb θάλλει, which Dioscorus appears to interchange with θάλλειϲ (Heitsch 4a.12, 5.3) and θάλλοιϲ (Heitsch 2.29, 12b.9) with no change in meaning.

The Dioscorian phrase μὴ τρομέειϲ is found nowhere else in Greek literature. The phrase μὴ τρομέοιϲ is found often in Nonnus at the beginning of a verse; see Dionysiaca 4.117, 11.79, 18.236, 29.56, etc. Therefore Dioscorus and his literary audience knew how the right form should look. By using the indicative, Dioscorus emphasizes the reality of the action (unlike the optative): literally “do not continue being afraid”. The only time that Jesus expressed fear was when he approached his sacrifice to redeem humanity from sin. When Jesus and his disciples were at Gethsemane in the Garden of Olives: παραλαβὼν τὸν Πέτρον καὶ τοὺς δύο υἱοὺς Ζεβεδαίου ἤρξατο λυπεῖσθαι καὶ ἀδημονεῖν. τότε λέγει αὐτοῖς· περίλυπος ἐστιν ἡ ψυχή μου ἐως θανάτου· μείνατε ὅδε καὶ γηγορεῖτε μετ’ ἐμοῦ. καὶ προελθὼν μικρὸν ἐπέσεν ἐπὶ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ προσευχόμενος καὶ λέγων· πάτερ μου, εἰ δυνατόν ἐστιν, παρελθότω ἀπ’ ἐμοῦ τὸ ποτήριον τοῦτο. “He took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful and very heavy. Then saith he unto them: ‘My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me.’ And he went a little further, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying: ‘O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me’.” (Mt. 26:37-39; cf. Jo. 12:27-28)

It may be significant that Nonnus uses the word τρομέει in the Paraphrase when he recounts Christ’s parable about the pregnant woman (16.74-77): she “trembles” in fear as her hour approaches. With [μὴ τ]ρομέειϲ, Dioscorus

Clement A. Kuehn
continues the Salvation History allusions, which began with the envious snake.

σκηπτοῦχε: The word is used by Homer and in at least one other poem by Dioscorus. Dioscorus uses the vocative in Poem 35 (Heitsch 24) to address Although Dioscorus was usually original in selecting just the right epic vocabulary for his hymn, he did have precedences here. Nonnus had used the word σκηπτοῦχος already several times to describe God and Christ in his Paraphrase. Here Nonnus describes God:

οὕτω γὰρ πολύμορφον ἐφίλατο κόσμον ἀλήτην ὑψιμέδων σκηπτοῦχος, ὃτι χραισμίτορα φωτῶν μονογενὴ λόγον ὑπὰ πόρεν τετράζυγι κόσμῳ, ὄφρα μιν ὃς δέξοιτο μετάτροπον ἃθος ἀμείψας.
For the scepter-holder, ruling on high, loved the world, manifold and roving, so much that He sent his only-begotten Son, the Word, as a helper of mankind, to the four-yoked world, in order that it, having altered its changeable ways, might receive Him. (Paraphrase 3.80-83)

And here Jesus uses the word σκηπτοῦχος before Pilate to describe himself:

... τούτο πιθαύνεις
ἀντάματος σκηπτοῦχον Ἰουδαίων με καλέσσας, ἡ̂ σοι ἄλλος ἔστιε; καὶ ἔστη ὄρχημος ἄνηρ·
mὴ γὰρ Ἰουδαῖος καὶ ἐγὼ πέλον; ...
... “Did you utter this on your own, when you called me the scepter-holder of the Jews, or did someone else tell you?” And the chief man said: “I am not a Jew, am I? ... ” (Paraphrasis 18.161-164)

And here a complaint is made to Pilate to change the inscription above the cross. Note the word κοίρανος here in Nonnus, used to describe Jesus, and the word κοιρανίηϲ in verses 17 and 21. Nonnus was the most influential poet of the early Byzantine Era, and his vocabulary would have been recognized by Dioscorus’s educated audience.

μὴ γράφε, μὴ γράφε τότον Ἰουδαίων βασιλῆα, ἀλλ’ ὁτι κείνος ἔλεξεν ἐῇ ψευδήμον φωνῇ: κοίρανος Ἑβραίων τελέθω σκηπτοῦχος Ἰησοῦς. καὶ Πιλάτος φάτο µῦθον ἀπηνέας ἀνδρας ἐλέγχων: έγραφον ἁσφαλέως, τόπερ έγραφον. ... “Do not write, do not write that he is King of the Jews, but that he said in his own lying voice: ‘I am Jesus, the sovereign scepter-holder of the Hebrews.’ And Pilate gave this response, dishonoring the harsh men: “Steadfast have I written exactly what I have written.” (Paraphrasis 19.111-115)

κλέοϲ οὔποτ’ ὀλεῖται: This is a standard phrase in Greek poetry. τεὸν κλέος οὔποτ’ ὀλεῖται is used in two other poems by Dioscorus: at Poem 6.4 and 9.1 (MacCoull p. 123.2; Heitsch 20.1). The phrase was used by Homer, but not by Nonnus. Significantly, it was used several times by the epic poet Eudocia Augusta (c. 401-460), the wife of Emperor Theodosius II; see

Clement A. Kuehn
Homeroentones, Hypothesis-apologia-cento 10, lines 280-284; section 2, line 282; section 2, line 1945; and section 3, line 91. Eudocia wrote poetry on biblical themes in an Homeric style. She composed much of it in Jerusalem, after she had been banished from Constantinople by her husband the emperor.

[cũ] ἵτεφος ὑψικάρηνος πάμφυλον : Maspero suggests [ὁς] “as”. The restoration here is by Fournet, who argues that Dioscorus was employing metonymy and not creating a simile. The adjectives ὑψικάρηνος and πάμφυλον could modify either ἵτεφος or κιβώτιν and be grammatically correct, since both nouns are neuter. But neither adjective makes sense when describing a small box. Both adjectives, therefore, modify ἵτεφος, which arrangement Dioscorus stresses by interpolating the verb ἔϲϲι.

ἵτεφος : is the poetic word for στέφανος; see Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis 1512, etc. Dioscorus appears to repeat the word in verse 29 below, but does not use the term στέφος or στέφανος in other poems, except in compounds and a plural: χρυσοστεφάνοιο (Heitsch 3.30), χρυσ[οστ]εφάνου (Heitsch 21.4), ἐυστέφανοις (Heitsch 5.27), and στεφέεσσι (Heitsch 23.11; cf. 21.11). Homer does not use the word, but Nonnus does. In the Paraphrase, the only use of στέφος is for the crown of thorns worn by Jesus (19.22).

In Clement of Alexandria, we find that Christ is called the crown of the Church:

«Στέφανος δὲ γερόντων τέκνα τέκνων, δόξα δὲ παισίν οἱ πατέρες», φησίν· ἣμίν δὲ <δόξα> ὁ πατήρ τῶν ὅλων, καὶ τῆς συμπάσης

Clement A. Kuehn
He says: “The crown of old men are the children of children, but the glory of children are their fathers.” But for us, the glory is the Father of all, and the crown of all the Church is Christ.
(Paedagogus, Book 2, chapter 8, subchapter 71, section 2, lines 1-3)

The same author repeats the concept as a metaphor several times:

The kings of the Jewish people make use of a crown intricately woven with gold and precious stones. The Christians escaped notice by symbolically wearing Christ on their head, by adorning their head with the Lord.
(Paedagogus, Book 2, chapter 8, subchapter 63, section 4, lines 1-3)

And again: Μένει δὲ ἀθάνατος ὁ στέφανος οὗτος κατ’ εἰκόνα τοῦ κυρίου· οὐ γὰρ μαραίνεται ὡς ἄνθος. “This crown remains deathless, as an image of the Lord: for it does not fade like the flower.” (Paedagogus, Book 2, chapter 8, subchapter 63, section 5, lines 4-5) Clement of Alexandria was an influential forerunner in developing Christian allegory.

It was a cliché, but also significant, that in the History of the Patriarchs of the Coptic Church of Alexandria, Theodosius received upon his death

Clement A. Kuehn
the crown of victory: “Theodosius was removed, in the peace of the Lord Jesus Christ whom he loved, on the 28th day of Baunah; and he received the crown of victory with the assembly of the saints in the land of the living for ever.” (PO 4 [=1.4], p. 468) ὑψικάρηνον: This long adjective makes for a lofty crown. The word ὑψικάρηνον was used by Nonnus in his Paraphrase to describe the hill on which Christ gathered his apostles, who sat around him like a crown (6.6-8):

καὶ δαπέδου λοφόεντος ἐρημιάδα πέξαν ὀddeύων eis ὄρος ὑψικάρηνον ἀνήμε: μεσσοφανή δὲ ἐξόμενον στεφανηδὸν ἐκυκλώσαντο μαθήται.
Traveling to a solitary place by foot, with the land rising, he went up a lofty hill; his disciples made a circle like a crown around him, who was seated in their midst. (6.6-8)

The term ὑψικάρηνον was also used in the poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus, to describe both virginity and Christ’s virgin bride, who is the Church; see Carmina moralia., column 562, line 4; and column 631, line 2. As the sixth-century monumental art at Ravenna shows, the virgins join the martyrs in receiving crowns from Christ and the Virgin Mary. Thus the adjective ὑψικάρηνος was already associated with crowns and Christ, but it was Dioscorus who made the connection that Christ was the lofty crown.

πάμπυλον: The word appears only here in Dioscorus’s poetry. It was not used by Homer or Nonnus. Thus the word is noteworthy. Its importance is emphasized by the unusual meter, which puts πάµφυλον in an awkward but striking position. The main caesura comes after the third foot: that is, in an unusual fashion, the verse caesura corresponds to the metrical foot break:

Clement A. Kuehn

-ρηνον || πάµφυλον = — — || — ~

This metaphorical imagery, that Christ is a lofty crown consisting of all the tribes, recalls the scene in the Apocalypse where the twenty-four elders in crowns are surrounding the center throne in heaven:

εὐθέως ἐγένη ἐν πνεύματι καὶ ἤδον θρόνος ἐκεῖ ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν θρόνον καθῆμενος ... καὶ κυκλόθεν τοῦ θρόνου θρόνοι εἴκοσι τέσσαρες, καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς θρόνους εἴκοσι τέσσαρας πρεσβυτέρους καθημένους περιβεβλημένους ἰματίοις λευκοῖς καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς κεφαλὰς αὐτῶν στεφάνους χρυσοῖς.

And immediately I was in the spirit: and behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne. ... And round about the throne were four and twenty thrones: and upon the thrones I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment; and they had on their heads crowns of gold. (4:2-4)

The elders are the twelve patriarchs of the Old Testament—the sons of Jacob, who represent the twelve tribes of Israel—and the twelve apostles of the New Testament (cf. Apoc. 21:12-14).

κιβωτίν : An unusually small word, which carried a large number of connotations.

As mentioned above, κιβωτίν is the diminutive neuter form of the feminine

Clement A. Kuehn
κιβωτός. Dioscorus contracted the ending to create an even smaller word, thus emphasizing it as the antithesis of the large phrase ἑτέφος υψικάρηνον πάμφυλον, which occupied most of the verse. A κιβότιον was a “small box” or “small chest”. The word was not used by Homer or Nonnus, and was used only here by Dioscorus. Yet it was a common word in Greek literature, and in Christian literature it could refer to a church’s collection box for the poor. See: Καὶ τὸ κιβότιον δὲ τούτο ἐκείνου τοῦ κιβωτίου πολλῷ βέλτιον καὶ ἀναγκαιότερον· οὐ γὰρ ἰμάτια, ἀλλ’ ἐλεημοσύνην ἔχει συγκεκλεισμένην, εἰ καὶ ὄλγοι εἰσὶν κεκτημένοι (Joannes Chrysostomus, In Matthaeeum, vol. 57, page 385, lines 1-3); and Τέως δὲ παρὰ σαυτῷ τίθει, φησὶ, καὶ ποίησόν σου τὴν οἰκίαν ἐκκλησίαν, τὸ κιβότιον γαζοφυλάκιον (Joannes Chrysostomus, In epistulam i ad Corinthios, vol. 61, page 368, lines 54-56). The same author, John Chrysostom, in an extended metaphor contrasts the κιβότιον that holds extra clothing to the Body of Christ, which consists of the destitute:

Εἰ γὰρ μὴ βούλει ταῦτα γενέσθαι σητόβρωτα, δὸς τοῖς πτωχοῖς· ἐκεῖνοι γὰρ εἰσὶν οἱ τὰ ἱμάτια ταῦτα εἰδότες τινάσσειν καλῶς. Καὶ γὰρ τοῦ κιβωτίου τὸ σῶμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ τιμιώτερόν τε καὶ ἀσφαλέστερον. Οὔτε γὰρ μόνον φυλάσσει τὰ ἱμάτια, οὔτε ἀνάλωτα διατηρεῖ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ λαμπρότερα ἔργάζεται. Τὸ κιβότιον πολλάκις μετὰ τῶν ἱματίων ληφθὲν ληφθὲν ἐσχάτη σε περιέβαλε τὴν φυλακήν.

If you do not wish for these things to be eaten by moths, then give them to the poor: for they are the ones that know how to shake out these coats well. Indeed the Body of Christ is more valuable and more secure than the coffer. It not only preserves the coats, and not only keeps them incorruptible, but also makes them more brilliant. Often the coffer, having been stolen with the coats, puts you at an extreme loss. But not even death is able to ruin this safe.

Clement A. Kuehn

The related word, κιβωτός, was used to refer to the Ark of the Covenant, which in turn was used in Christian literature as a symbol of Christ’s humanity. See: Προανετυπούτο δὴ οὖν ὡς ἐν τῇ κιβωτῷ Χριστός· κατεσκεύαστο γὰρ ἐκ ξύλων ἀσήπτων ἐκεῖνη, καὶ τὸν θείον ἐν ἑαυτῇ κατεπύκαζε νόμον, ὃς ἦστι Λόγος Θεοῦ. “The Ark was an early type of Christ: for it was prepared from wood that was not liable to decay and it protected in itself the divine law, which is the Word of God.” (Cyrillus Alexandrinus, De adoratione et cultu in spiritu et veritate, vol. 68, page 385, lines 12-15) The same term κιβωτός was used in the Septuagint for Noah’s ark (Gen. 6:14 ff.), which in Christian literature became a type of the Church. Didymus the Blind writes: καὶ ἡ κιβωτὸς αὐτῆς, σώσασα τοὺς ἐν αὐτῇ εἰσφρήσαντας, εἰκὼν τῆς σεπτῆς ἐτύγχανεν Ἐκκλησίας καὶ τῆς ἐντεῦθεν ὑπαρχούσης ἡμῶν ἀγαθῆς ἐλπίδος. “This ark, having saved those that had entered into it, became an image of the august Church and of our good hope that is within.” (Didymus Caecus, De trinitate, vol. 39, page 696, lines 7-10)

All three images—the poor-box, Noah’s ark, and the Ark of the Covenant—would have arisen in the minds of the audience when they had heard κιβωτίν, and all relate to the Body of Christ. Thus the statement [ϲυ] … ἐϲϲι κιβωτίν is religiously accurate and profound. But the most important imagery is created by the entire verse, which is an original adaptation of the Apocalypse verse:
Καὶ εἶπεν μοι, Γέγοναν. ἔγω τὸ Ἀλφα καὶ τὸ Ὡ, ἡ ἀρχὴ καὶ τὸ τέλος.

And he said unto me: “It is done. I am the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end.” (21:6)

[ἀκτ]ίνεϲ ἀϲτράπτουϲι τεῆϲ περικαλλέοϲ ὀμφῆϲ : The verse begins with an alliteration of alpha sounds (ἀκ- ἀϲτρά-) that are echoed in the second half of the verse by -καλ-. And as mentioned above, the final sigma sound on every word creates a consonance that ties the verse together.

This verse is reminiscent of several important biblical images. The first involves the trip to Damascus by Saul, who as a Roman soldier was on his way to imprison Christians. He is knocked off his horse by lightning and hears a voice from heaven. The biblical story uses περιήστραψεν “shone round like lightning”, which is a compound form of Dioscorus’s verb ἀϲτράπτουϲι:

Ἐν δὲ τῷ πορεύεσθαι, ἐγένετο αὐτὸν ἐγγίζειν τῇ Δαμασκῷ, ἐξαίφνης τε αὐτὸν περιήστραψεν φῶς ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καὶ πεσὼν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν ἤκουσεν φωνὴν λέγουσαν αὐτῷ: Σαούλ Σαούλ, τί µε διώκεις;

And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus; and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven. And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him: “Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?” (Acts 9:3-4)

The second biblical passage, part of which we have already discussed, is found in the Apocalypse:

Clement A. Kuehn
καὶ κυκλόθεν τοῦ θρόνου θρόνοι εἴκοσι τέσσαρες, καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς θρόνους εἴκοσι τέσσαρας πρεσβυτέρους καθήμενους περιβεβλημένους ἰματίως λευκοῖς καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς κεφαλὰς αὐτῶν στεφάνους χρυσούς. καὶ ἐκ τοῦ θρόνου ἐκπορεύονται ἄστραπαὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ βρονταὶ …

And round about the throne were four and twenty thrones. And upon the thrones I saw four and twenty elders sitting clothed in white raiment, and they had on their heads crowns of gold. And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices … .” (4:4-5)

And finally, the Lord speaking from heaven in thunder and lightening is a frequent image in the Psalms:

καὶ ἐβρόντησεν ἐξ οὐρανοῦ Κύριος, / καὶ ὁ ὑψιστὸς ἐδωκεν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ· / καὶ ἔσκόρπισεν αὐτοὺς / καὶ ἀστραπὰς ἐπλήθυνεν καὶ συνετάραξεν αὐτούς. “The Lord also thundered in the heavens, / and the Highest gave his voice. / Yea, he sent out his arrows and scattered them; / and he shot out lightnings and discomfited them.” (Ps. 17:14-15 / 18:13-14; cf. Ps. 77:18; etc.)

Dioscorus’s verse combines the lightning and divine voice into one metaphor, which is original but also raises a problem. In the Bible, when the Lord speaks in lightning and thunder, it is intimidating. Yet Dioscorus describes Christ’s voice as περικαλλέοϲ “very beautiful”. Thus there is a dichotomy between the first half of the verse and the second. The dichotomy is intensified by a mismatching pair: ἄκτινεϲ and ὀμφῆϲ “the rays … of your voice”. The distance between these two words shows the powerful influence of the voice, but voices do not normally emit light rays.

Clement A. Kuehn
[ἀκτ]ινεϲ : The restoration is by Maspero. In Homer, the word is found only in the dative case and refers to the rays of the sun. In the Classical period, ἀκτίς is used for lightning (Pindarus, Pythia 4.198) and the ray of Zeus, which is lightning: ὁ Διὸς ἀκτίς, παῖσον! “O ray of Zeus, strike!” (Sophocles, Trachiniae 1086) It is also used for the rays of fire: τὰς δὲ ἐντὸς τοῦ πυρὸς ἀκτίνας διαδεδεµένας (Plato, Timaeus 78d).

ἀστράπτουϲι : means literally “to lighten” or “to hurl lightnings”. Later it comes to mean “to flash like lightning” (Sophocles, Oedipus Coloneus 1067). This word is used by Homer and Nonnus, and used again by Dioscorus (perhaps in a compound form) at Poem 9.3 (Heitsch 20.3). The verb has divine connotations going back to Homer, who uses it to describe omens sent by Zeus, since lightning travels from heaven to earth (Il. 2.353; 9.237; etc.).

The verb ἀστράπτω and its noun equivalent ἀστραπή are also used in biblical literature. In the Gospel of Luke, lightning is a simile for Christ appearing in his divine glory at the end of time: ὥσπερ γὰρ ἡ ἀστραπὴ ἀστράπτουϲα ἐκ τῆς ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανὸν εἰς τὴν ὑπ’ οὐρανὸν λάµµει, οὕτως ἔσται ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου [ἐν τῇ ἡµέρᾳ αὐτοῦ]. “For as the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven shineth unto the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of Man be in his day.” (Lc. 17:24) Again in the same Gospel, a compound form of the verb is used to describe Christ in his glory on Mount Tabor: τὸ εἰδός τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἐτερον καὶ ὁ ἰµατισµὸς αὐτοῦ λευκὸς ἐξαστράπτων (Lc. 9:29). And Luke uses the participle of the verb to describe the clothing of the angels at Christ’s empty grave, when a small group of women visit: εἰσελθοῦσαι δὲ οὐχ εὗρον τὸ σῶµα τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. καὶ ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ ἀπορεῖσθαι αὐτᾶς περὶ τοῦτον καὶ ἰδοὺ ἄνδρες δύο ἐπέστησαν αὐτᾶς ἐν ἐσθήτῃ ἀστραπτούσῃ. ... εἶπαν πρὸς αὐτᾶς· τί ζητεῖτε τὸν ζῶντα μετὰ τῶν νεκρῶν; “And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments. ... they said unto them: ‘Why seek ye the living among the dead?’” (Lc. 24:3-5) The women’s response to the lightning-bright vision is dread: ἐµφόβων δὲ γενοµένων αὐτῶν καὶ κλινουσῶν τὰ πρόσωπα εἰς τὴν γῆν “they were afraid and bowed down their faces to the earth” (Lc 24:5).

Clement A. Kuehn

Similarly in the Apocalypse, when the Ark of the Covenant is revealed in heaven, flashes of lightning and voices arise: καὶ ἤνοίγη ὁ ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ [ὁ] ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, καὶ ὀφθη ἡ κιβωτὸς τῆς διαθήκης αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ ναῷ αὐτοῦ· καὶ ἐγένοντο ἀστραπαὶ καὶ φωναι καὶ βρονται καὶ σεισµοὶ καὶ χάλαζα µεγάλη. “And the temple of God was opened in heaven. And there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament, and there were lightnings and voices and thunderings and an earthquake and great hail.” (Apoc. 11:19)

These and similar biblical passages show that: (1) lightning carries divine connotations; (2) divine lightning is often associated with divine speech; and (3) the flash and accompanying blast usually cause trepidation. Close encounters with lightning are not described with the words “very beautiful”. Thus there is a dichotomy between the flashing rays at the beginning of the verse and the lovely voice at the end.

Clement A. Kuehn
In Homer, ὀμφῆ always refers to the gods, especially when communicating to mortals. See for example: ταῦτα θεῶν ἐκ πεύσεται ὀμφῆς. “These things will be learned from the voice of the gods.” (II. 20.129). It is also used for the voice of the dream sent by Zeus to Agamemnon (II. 2.41). In the Classical Era, it is used for oracles sent by the gods (Theognis 808; Sophocles, Oedipus Coloneus 102; etc.) and even for the omens of birds (Apollonius Rhodius 3.939). Nonnus in his Dionysiaca also tends to limit the term to divine and oracular utterances. In his Paraphrase, he uses it for the voice of Christ (Χριστὸς ἀνήρυγε θέσκελον ὀμφῆς 3.49) and the voice of John the Baptist (ἀγνὸν Ἰωάννην θεοδέγμονς ἔγκυον ὀμφῆς 5.127). And it is associated with the Spirit, when Christ says: μύθων δ’ ἡμετέρων ρόος ἔνθεος, οὗς ἄγορεύω, ζωὴ ὁμοῦ καὶ πνεῦμα πέλει καὶ ἐτήτυμος ὀμφῆ. “The inspired stream of our words, which I speak, is both life and Spirit, and a truthful voice” (6:195-196). Throughout Greek literature, ὀμφῆ usually carries divine and oracular connotations.

And there is some Classical precedence to Dioscorus’s “lovely voice”. The term ὀμφῆ can be modified to imply that the voice is sweet or tuneful. Compare Dioscorus’s phrase with Pindar’s ὀμφαὶ μελέων (Fragmenta 75.19) and ἀδέια … ὀμφαί (Nemea 10.34). And in the Theogony, we find a phrase similar to Dioscorus’s περικαλλέα ὀμφῆς: Hesiod describes the inspiring voice of the Muses as περικαλλέα ὀσσαν (verse 10).

Yet there still exists a dichotomy between the first half of the verse and the second, because lightning-like flashes commonly cause fear, not admiration, and because voices do not emit rays of light. Perhaps the incongruity between

Clement A. Kuehn
[ἀκτ]ῖνες and ὠμής “the rays … of your voice”, which words are separated by the entire verse, stresses the spirituality: it is the divine Spirit of Christ that now communicates in lightning. For the Spirit’s relationship to Christ, see John 14:26: ὁ δὲ παράκλητος τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, ὅ πέμψει ὁ πατὴρ ἐν τῷ ὄντω μου ἐκεῖνος ὑμᾶς διδάξει πάντα καὶ ὑπομνήσει ὑμᾶς πάντα ἃ ἐσπον ὑμῖν ἐγὼ. “But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.” When the Holy Spirit does come to teach the disciples, it is in the form of fire from heaven:

καὶ ἐγένετο ἄφνω ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἦχος ὡσεὶ φερομένης πνοῆς βιαίας καὶ ἐπλήρωσεν ὅλον τὸν οἶκον ὃ ἦν καθήμενος, καὶ ὄφθησαν αὐτοῖς δια ἐριζόμενα γλῶσσαι ὡσεὶ πυρὸς καὶ ἐκάθισεν ἐφ’ ἕνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν πάντες πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέραις γλώσσαις καθὼς τὸ πνεῦμα ἐδίδου ἀποφθέγγεσθαι αὐτοῖς. (Acts 2:2-4)

And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.”

Thus the apparent incongruity of the image of rays flashing from a voice is solved when one examines the verse through a spiritual lens: it is the Spirit of Christ that Dioscorus is now describing.

Clement A. Kuehn
A resolution of the dichotomy between ἀϲτράϲτουϲQ, which is terrifying, and περικαλλέοϲ, which is attractive, can now be found: it lies in the final effect of the lightning. In Psalm 17, quoted above, the Lord’s lightning and thunderous voice make David’s enemies flee. In Acts, the voice in the lightning brings a sudden end to Saul’s violent persecutions. In the Apocalypse, the lightning and voices from the throne signal the end of the evil reign of Babylon. All these outcomes are highly desirable. In Dioscorus’s hymn, the Spirit’s voice is as frightening as lightning. But because it has beautiful results, it is lovely.

Verses 29-30

[..] ετέρος υψικάρη[νον .].ν.. λαυράτα ... κατ...αφ..
[.....].ς ιμείρων φιλοπάρθενος ε[
[..] the lofty crown .....] portrait
[.........] lover of virginity, desiring [

λαυράτα : This word does not appear in Homer or Nonnus. It is not used elsewhere in the poetry of Dioscorus. If the reconstruction, tentatively suggested by Fournet, is correct, then on the surface level Dioscorus is referring to a laurel-wreathed portrait of the emperor, the λαυράτον; on the allegorical level, he is referring to an icon.
It would be in keeping with Dioscorus’s style to use the term λαυράτον to maintain the surface level of meaning and also to suggest the λαύρα. The word λαύρα means literally “alley”, but was used to describe monasteries. The festival to St. Theodosius, where this hymn could have been recited, could have occurred in a monastic environment. It would be this religious connotation—as well as the surface level of meaning—that governed the choice of words; otherwise, Dioscorus would have used the word εἰκών, which we find often in his poetry.

ἱµηρῶν φιλοπάρθενοϲ: Although we do not have the entire verse, there seems to be an antithesis between “desiring” and “loving virginity”. Yet the term ἰµείρω does not have to suggest sexual desire. For example, it is used by Aeschylus for the desire for battle (Agamemnon 940) and by Sophocles for the desire for life (Fragmenta 952). ἰµείρω is used by Homer and Nonnus, and in two other poems by Dioscorus. In one of the two occurrences in the Paraphrase, Nonnus uses the verb in participial form to describe the desire of the apostles to follow Jesus: … καὶ οὐ θέµις, ὀππόθι βαίνω, / ὑµέας ἰµείροντας ἀνέµβατον οḯµον ὅδευειν. “ … and it is not right that you travel the inaccessible path where I am going, although you desire it.” (7.138-139)
In the other, the verb describes the desire to kill Jesus (7.75).

Dioscorus uses the word φιλοπάρθενοϲ (“loving virginity” or “loving virgins”) again at Poem 18.50 (Heitsch 5.26). This word does not appear in Homer, but often in Nonnus’s Dionysiaca. It appears only twice in the Paraphrase, with several other forms of the word in a dense polyptoton at the climax of the narrative. Jesus on the cross turns to his mother and addresses her as

Clement A. Kuehn
“one who loves virginity.” Jesus then calls her attention to her new virgin son, John. Jesus then turns to the disciple that he loved, John, and addresses him as “one who loves virginity,” and calls his attention to the Virgin Mary. Jesus then hands her over to John’s guardianship, and the latter makes the Virgin part of his household. (Cf. Jo. 19:26-27)

When Christ saw the one that had borne the divine Son, and the disciple whom he loved, he said these words to his mother: “Woman, mother who loves virginity, lo! a virgin son.” And he said to his disciple on the other side: “Lo! a virgin woman, one who loves virginity, … (Paraphrasis 19.138-141)

Traditionally, the apostle John was also the author of the Gospel that served as the foundation for Nonnus’s Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John. Romanus the Melodist, the hymnwriter and older contemporary of Dioscorus, uses the term φιλοπάρθενος only once and only when describing John. The apostle is also called θεολόγος, which recalls the evangelist tradition.

ό θεολόγος καὶ φίλος τοῦ Χριστοῦ
Ότε οὖν ἠλθες πρὸς μαθητείαν ὑπὲρ πάντας τοὺς ἄλλους ἡγαπήθης, σοφέ, ώς πράος καὶ φιλοπάρθενος.

Clement A. Kuehn
The theologian and friend of Christ:
When therefore you came to the discipleship, you were loved
beyond all others,
wise one,
because you were kind and loved virginity.
(Cantica dubia, Hymn 60, proem-strophe + section 4, line 1)

Because of the condition of the Dioscorian papyrus, it is impossible to say who is the subject of the words ἱμηρων and φιλοπάρθενος. One might note, however, that virginity was highly prized in the early Byzantine culture. And in the History of the Patriarchs of Alexandria, virginity is the first attribute named for Theodosius; his writing skills are named later.

Verses 31-32

[oúραν]όθεν Θεὸς ύμι πόρεν διαδήματα φωτός.
[No] lord was ever like you:
From heaven God has given you diadems of light.

These two verses are held together and united by omicron assonance. Both verses have a quick rhythm, with a preponderance of dactyls. The only spondees in the couplet are found at [oúðamós] δὲ ἀναξ, “no lord”, where the five long syllables create a majestic beginning. Unlike the rest of the words in the verse, ἀναξ has no omicron. Thus, because ἄναξ does not fit with the rest of the verse metrically or phonetically, it resonates. Up to this point in Poem 17, Dioscorus has signified authority with the word βαϲιλεύϲ three times: in referring to God (verse 8), the Old Testament patriarchs (verse 19), and the New Testament saints (verse 20). He has also used the words πολύϲκηπτροϲ (verse 7), στρατίϲροϲ (verse 15), and σκηπτοῦχοϲ (verse 26). This is the first time that he has used the Homeric word ἄναξ. Therefore the word choice, assonance, and meter strengthen the meaning of the verse: there is no one else in Poem 17 like Christ the ἄναξ.

Clement A. Kuehn

Verse 32 creates a chiasmic ring structure, which supports the image of a diadem. The term Θεὸϲ recalls verses 9 and 13, and the plural pronoun ὑμι distantly echoes the plural pronoun ἡμιν of verses 1 and 2. Helping further to unify the poem, the διαδήματα recalls the crown of 27 and 29, and the φωτόϲ recalls the light imagery in verse 28.

[οὐδαμῶς] δὲ ἄναξ: The restoration is by Maspero. Οὐδαμός, because it is a contraction of οὐδὲ ἀμός, has a long alpha and fits the epic meter perfectly. But it creates a couple of heavy spondees in an otherwise light verse. Although not used by Homer and Nonnus, the word οὐδαμός appears already in Hesiod.

While ἄναξ can mean any sort of lord or master, in Homer it was used to refer to divinities, especially Apollo the son of Zeus (ἄναξ Διὸς υἱὸς Ἀπόλλων II. 7.23, 7.37, 16.804, 20.103, and 8.334). This usage was continued during the Classical Era, when we find: ὁ Πύθιος ἄναξ (Aeschylus, Agamemnon 509); ἄναξ Ἀπόλλον (Aeschylus, Agamemnon 513; Eumenides 85; etc.); ὄναξ Ἀπόλλον (Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 80); and ὄναξ without Ἀπόλλον

Clement A. Kuehn
The title was also used for other divinities, such as Zeus, Poseidon, and the Dioscuri. Homer also used the term ἄναξ to designate heroes, such as Agamemnon the commander-in-chief, and Teiresias the blind prophet (Il. 1.442; Od. 11.144, 151; etc.). The term could be used to designate the sons or brothers of kings (Isocrates 9.72, etc.). Dioscorus uses the word frequently; see verse 34 below (a restoration) and Heitsch 2.1, 6; 3.32; 4a.15; 5.7, 13, 60; 6.16; 12b.8; 13.7; etc.). Nonnus uses the term frequently in the Dionysiaca. In the Paraphrase, he employs it to designate Christ, often in a set phrase occupying the first one and a half feet: Χριστὸς ἄναξ (1.68, 3.142, 7.117, 7.141. 7.153, etc.).

Here, on the allegorical level, Dioscorus uses the term ἄναξ to designate Christ as God and man (following the twin usage of ἄναξ for god and hero in Homer). In that sense there is no one like him: neither in the Trinity nor on earth. His uniqueness is underlined by the unusual adjective πανομοιοίος:

πανομοιοίος: This word is uncommon in Greek literature. The adjective appears first, perhaps, in the 2nd century A.D. in the epic writer Oppianus (Cynegeticca, Book 4, line 173). It is used later by Nonnus, Apollinaris, and at least twice in the Greek Anthology (AP 7.599: Julien; and AP 9.482: Agathias). With these authors, it is followed by a dative case. Dioscorus uses the word also at Poem 4.23 (Heitsch 12b.5), where he follows it with a dative. Here, however, Dioscorus seems to follow it with a genitive: εἴο. This unique use of the genitive with this adjective further underlines the specialness of the ἄναξ.
Because it is a negative expression, the παν- underlines the negative: literally “not at all similar.”

ἔπλετο: As mentioned in the discussion of verse 16, this form can be taken as an imperfect or aorist tense. In Homer, the imperfect goes unaugmented. In the aorist it can be translated as a present tense: “he became” equals “he is”. I translated the same verb above (ἔπλευ), which was used for Theodosius, as an imperfect (“you were”) and I repeat that tense here.

To summarize verse 31: Dioscorus created a remarkable blend of style and meaning to establish that the Lord is absolutely unique. Stylistically, Dioscorus chose words that were unusual: ἄναξ in this hymn, and πανομοίος in Greek literature. He created a quick dactyl couplet, in which ἄναξ stood out with its two slow syllables. He created an omicron assonance, in which ἄναξ stood out with its alphas. And the final word of the verse (the genitive σεῖο), which referred back to the ἄναξ, was a grammatical anomaly. The poet has pulled all stops, but so skillfully that his craftsmanship goes almost unnoticed.

[oυραν] θεν … πόρεν: The restoration is by Maspero. The pair of words is found in Nonnus, when speaking of God’s gift of manna to the Jewish people in the desert: … ὄμετρήτω ποτὲ λαῷ / οὐρανόθεν πόρεν ἄρτον, … “He once gave bread from heaven to an immeasurable people (Paraphrase 6.129-130).

ὑμὶ … διαδήματα φωτός: After emphasizing the absolute uniqueness of the Lord, the poet now addresses him with a plural pronoun ὑμὶ and shows him

Clement A. Kuehn
receiving diadems. These diadems are not the same as the lofty crown above (στέφος υψικάρηνον, verses 27 and 29). If Dioscorus was influenced by the pictorial art in the church, the διαδήματα φωτός could be saints’ haloes or even the medallions holding images of the saints. See the encaustic icon of St. Peter (Figure 3) and the Coptic tapestry of the Theotokos (Figure 5), both from the 6th century. These haloes and medallions would be golden and in sunlight perhaps gleam. Through such an allusion to pictorial art, the Dioscorian imagery of diadems of light from heaven would recall the biblical concept that the faithful were entrusted to Christ’s care by God (Jo. 6:39; etc.) And the plurality repeats the motif that the Body of Christ is made up of the many faithful (see the discussion of υμετέρησιν … χερσίν in verse 23 above). In other words: successful nurturing of the faithful would lead to their sainthood (διαδήματα φωτός) and this care was entrusted by God (Θεὸς … πόρευ) to Christ and his Church (ὑμ).

There is, however, another interpretation possible, and both allegorical meanings can coexist simultaneously. The poet pointed out that the word διαδήματα is important. Literally “a band”, the term is used neither by Homer nor by Nonnus, and by Dioscorus only here. To further stress it, the poet surrounded the five syllable word with words of only two syllables. Diadem imagery combined with light imagery is found in a Christian context both in Eusebius and Clement of Alexandria. Clement quotes an account given by the prophet Sophonias about the prophet’s ascent into the fifth heaven. There the angels are called lords, wear diadems, and sit on thrones of light (Stromata, Book 5, chapter 11, section 77, subsection 2, lines 1-6). In Eusebius, the imagery is used to describe the rewards that Christ is given in heaven:

Clement A. Kuehn
The inspired prophet referred to all these things when he said: “And Jesus was clad in filthy garments.” But He put them from Him by his Ascension into the heavens, and the return from our condition of slavery to his own [glory], and He is crowned with the diadem of his Father’s divinity, and is girt with the bright robe of his Father’s light, and is glorified with the divine mitre and the other high priestly adornments.

(Demonstratio evangelica, Book 4, chapter 17, section 19, lines 1-5)

And most significantly, one of the final images in the Apocalypse is that of Christ wearing diadems and surrounded by light:

And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse. And he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth... judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many diadems ... . (19:11-12)

Inspired by Christian art, and influenced by Patristic and biblical imagery, Dioscorus perhaps wove two diadems of meaning together to create the allegorical level of verse 32.
These are the oldest surviving poems written by the hand of a known poet. Dioscorus’s sixth-century manuscripts, with revisions and corrections, were discovered on papyrus in 1905 beneath the village of Kom Ashkaw, Egypt (ancient Aphrodito). The manuscripts are now held in museums and libraries around the world. Although Dioscorus was an Egyptian, he composed his poetry in Greek, the cultural language of the Byzantine Era. Once considered obscure, the meaning of the poems becomes clear when seen through the lens of Byzantine spirituality. The first collection of his poems was published by the young Jean Maspero in 1911. The first volume of this new critical edition begins with an exploration of the allegorical meaning of one of Dioscorus’s masterpieces, the Hymn to St. Theodosius.